Rebel Alliances: The means and ends of contemporary British anarchisms

This thesis examines, classifies and evaluates the tactics and organisational methods of British and Irish anarchist groups, which operated in the period 1984-1999 (although reference is made to groupings and events outside of this period). The thesis explains how class struggle anarchism, which was a minority trend even within the libertarian milieu, has developed into a significant and lively (anti-)political movement. This thesis examines recent groups through their own publications and their accounts of their recent actions.

Previous studies have attempted to assess anarchist methods through either liberal or traditional Marxist categories. This thesis develops a mode of assessment that is consistent with the methods of evaluation used by anarchists themselves. This prefigurative ethic is used to build up an ideal-type of anarchism that is consistent with the main characteristics of libertarian theory.

Anarchist prefiguration – which demands that the means must be synecdochic in relation to the ends – requires that the oppressed become the agents who bring about change. Oppression is irreducible to capitalism alone, but in most contexts, economic oppression will be a significant force in the creation of the oppressed agent's identity. Anarchists' preference for 'direct action' captures their commitment to the means being in accordance with the ends, and the primacy of the oppressed in resisting their oppression.

The anarchist ideal is used as a standard to assess the operations of existing anarchist groups. Consistent with prefiguration, anarchist organisation and tactics have to be multiform and flexible, without strategic priority being given to any single organisation or structure. Anarchist tactics must also involve a variety of oppressed subjects, while undermining hierarchies of power. It will be shown that certain organisational methods associated with anarchism; such as old style syndicalism is incompatible with the prefigurative ethic. Similarly certain organisational structures, often dismissed as inconsistent with anarchist principles, such as temporary small groups carrying out selective propaganda by deed, can, under certain conditions, be consistent with anarchism.

The growth of class struggle anarchism is shown to be a result of its prefigurative and multiform organisation and its corresponding diversity of tactics.

This thesis was originally begun in September 1991, it has taken over nine years to complete. Nonetheless, it is this, the last page to be consigned to paper, which has proven the most difficult to write. There are so many people to whom I am deeply indebted, for their love, friendship and patience - that it is difficult to know where to start. This brief section already runs the risk of appearing like the Oscar night acceptance speech of a particularly neurotic actor. There are also the concerns of overlooking those who have made significant sacrifices - and of naming those who would prefer to remain anonymous. In listing people there is the additional hazard of those at the top being considered of greater importance than those in the middle or end, so except for the first few names, everyone else is listed in reverse alphabetical order. I have to start, however, by thanking my parents Susan and David Franks for their constant support, love and hot food. Second, I must acknowledge the exceptional help provided by my supervisor, Dr Jon Simons. His relevant and good-humoured advice was pertinent, if not always welcome.

My gratitude to the following is also quite beyond words:

Introduction

On Friday June 18th 1999, the leaders of the eight top industrialised countries met to discuss and agree further steps towards freer trade. At the same time, and in response, global protests took place against the threats to the environment, labour rights and social relations posed by the expansion of market disciplines. The largest protest was in Britain. The 'Carnival Against Capitalism'

(J18) started outside Liverpool Street Station, a terminus on the edge of the Square Mile (fig 0.1.). In the rare heat of a British summer sun thousands gathered, entertained by large portable sound-systems discharging electronic dance music or by the repetitive beats of a medley of drummers. Outside the banks, bond markets and the futures exchanges forming huge congregations were stilt walkers, fancy dressed dandies, semi-clad women smeared in mud, naked men carrying placards and young and elderly participants from hundreds of small groups. In the pleasant warmth they danced, or chanted encouragement to climbers traversing the facades of billion dollar corporations, the growing crowd clapping and cheering a successful ascent, before the audience turned into participants and sought to occupy the fortresses of global finance. The carnival had invaded the casino.

The multiplicity of targets reflected the diversity of interests and backgrounds of the groups and individuals taking part. Anger at the official labour movement's involvement in supporting the dictates of the government led to the occupation of Congress House - the head quarters of the Trade Union Congress (TUC). The LIFFE building (a trading exchange) was invaded. City traders, furious that their turf had been occupied by joyous assortments of anti-market pranksters and class struggle mobs, hurled abuse at the invaders of the free trade area. Rarely had the stockbrokers, Tom Wolffe's 'masters of the universe' been so threatened.

It was an oft-repeated joke when the news media relayed stories of 'violent gangs who had come ready prepared for trouble' that participants would easily recognise them as they wore protective padded clothing, had their faces covered by space-age helmets and carried extendable truncheons. The under-prepared City of London Police in attempting to clear away the protestors drove a van over one and assaulted dozens more. The mob turned on their aggressors and their sponsors and resisted the imposition of business as usual. The City of London was redecorated; street banners proclaiming visions of sustainability, community, equality and utopian possibility bedecked the streets. CCTV lenses were covered by plastic bags, the walls of financial institutions were repainted with slogans of poetic malice, a car show room was set on fire and a McDonald's windows were smashed. Those who took part in J18 included many explicitly class struggle anarchists, plus those with a distinct influence from this direction. Noticeably absent were participants from the once powerful Leninist organisations. Although some of the groups taking part in J18 were not explicitly class struggle, the modes of organisation, the targets and the methods were consistent with contemporary libertarianism.¹

This thesis traces the myriad methods employed by class struggle anarchist groups and assesses them according to how far they reflect and embody their complex, multiple objectives. The organisations identified under the heading of 'class-struggle

anarchism' include those that identify themselves as such, as well as those from autonomist marxist and situationist-inspired traditions. The organisations and propaganda groups examined include the Anarchist Black Cross (ABC), Anarchist Federation (AF) (formerly the Anarchist Communist Federation (ACF)), Anarchist Workers Group (AWG), Aufheben, Black Flag, Class War (CW), Earth First! (EF!), Here and Now, Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), Reclaim the Streets (RTS), Solidarity, Solidarity Federation (SolFed) (formerly the Direct Action Movement (DAM)), Subversion, Wildcat and Workers Solidarity Federation (WSF) as well as the precursors to these associations. Situationist and autonomist marxist collectives may profess unhappiness at being branded with the 'anarchist' stamp, so too Class War briefly differentiated themselves from 'anarchists', but all these groupings have participated in overtly libertarian events such as the annual Anarchist Bookfair. They are also key supporters of predominantly anarchist networks such as the Anti-Elections Alliance (AEA), No War But The Class War (NWBTCW) as well as local federations.²

Anarchism is a historically located set of movements. The opening chapter illustrates this by placing current groups and tactics in a wider context and introducing some of the main debates. The second chapter develops a framework for assessing anarchist actions, and ties this method of evaluation to the distinctive category of libertarian tactics known as 'direct action'. The third chapter elucidates the importance of the appropriate agent, and examines what sort of revolutionary subject anarchism should embrace if it is to remain consistent to its principles. The fourth and fifth chapters categorise and assess anarchist organisational forms and tactics according to the types of group involved and their suitability according to the framework.

In the past the class struggle trend was attractive to a broad swathe of the industrial working class, especially amongst the Jewish immigrant communities of the late Nineteenth century. As Chapter One demonstrates, the socialist variants of anarchism was the most important within the more general libertarian milieu, where it competed with individualist, liberal and anarcho-capitalist anarchist alternatives and also, often detrimentally, with state-socialism. This latter became increasingly important from 1917, when Vladimir Lenin's triumphant Bolshevik forces were thought to have provided the successful blueprint by many in the revolutionary movement. Anarchism has often been in debate with Leninism and as a result discussion of anarchist tactics goes hand-in-hand with critiques of orthodox marxist strategies.

The hegemonic influence of Leninism began to fade most significantly after Kruschev's speech denouncing Stalin. This was followed by the Soviet invasion of Hungary in 1956, and orthodox Communism continued to decline culminating in the fall of the Soviet Empire in 1989. However, its influence has not entirely disappeared - it still lingers within revolutionary socialist movements, including aspects of anarchist organisational and tactical activities. The significance of the conflict between Leninism and anarchism is incorporated into the thesis, as anarchist methods are partly the result of a rejection of authoritarian socialism. The decline of Leninist movements has gone hand in hand with the weakening in influence of anti- or non-egalitarian anarchist groups. After taking a position of dominance within the relatively restrictive anarchist milieu between the post-Second World War period and the Miners' Strike of 1984-5, liberal anarchism went into decline, as class struggle groupings became predominant (the distinction between liberal and class struggle anarchism is discussed below). In order to throw light on the increased significance of class struggle anarchism within the libertarian, and more general, environment the thesis centrally concerns itself with the 15-year interval from the Miners Strike to J18. However, reference is made to groups, events and texts from outside this period.

In Chapter Two, contemporary post-structuralist anarchism is identified, and a form of evaluation is developed (an ideal type) that is consistent with anarchist precepts. The four identifying axioms are listed below. A prefigurative ethic, in which the means are consistent with the ends, is one that conforms to anarchism's own forms of assessment. This moral framework is evaluated against competing moral theories in particular the consequentialist (ends-based) moral theories of utilitarianism and Leninism as well as (means-based) Kantian deontology. The latter informs liberal ethics. Ideal type anarchism differs significantly from these approaches and acknowledges the importance of the oppressed themselves being the agents of change. The prefigurative ethic is clarified by analysing the class of actions known as 'direct action' in which the aim is embodied in the deed.

Anarchism approves of direct action because as a liberation movement it asserts that the oppressed must take the primary role in overthrowing their oppression. This prefigurative characteristic is also a necessary component of direct action. Chapter Three identifies the moral agent of change approved by the anarchist ideal. This paradigm regards the revolutionary subject to be the oppressed themselves. This concept of the revolutionary agent starts with the marxist notion of the 'working class', based on the economic subjugation of those without control of the means of production. However, this concept is widened beyond the single identity of an economically determined subject, instead consistent anarchism recognises that agents of change are multiple and in flux. Oppressive practices combine differently in specific contexts. Whether it is economic subjugation, patriarchy or racism, these forces appear, overlap or encode in different ways depending on context, with no one form having total sway. Such an account stands in contrast to Leninist versions of the revolutionary subject, the influence of which can still be identified in some parts of the libertarian movement. The term 'working class' in the most consistent forms of contemporary anarchism refers to the plethora of radical subjectivities. In different contexts different oppressive factors come together. These powers differ according to context. In most, if not all circumstances, the economic conditions of capitalism play a dominant (but not exclusive) oppressive role, hence the continuation of terminology based in marxist analysis.

By concentrating on class struggle libertarianism this thesis stands in contrast to much speculative writings on the subject. Academics, such as Robert Wolff and Robert Norzick, have associated the term with individualism and economic liberalism [Wolff, 1976 & Norzick, 1984]. The contrast and often conflict between class struggle and liberal traditions is mirrored in America in the clash between social and lifestyle libertarians.³ The latter 'self-centred' or lifestyle anarchists consider the individual to be an ahistoric 'free-booting, self-seeking, egoistic monad [....] immensely de-individuated for want of any aim beyond the satisfaction of their own needs and pleasures' [Bookchin, 1995, 16].⁴ The social anarchist, whilst recognising that individuals are self-motivated and capable of autonomous decision-making, also maintains that agents are historically and socially located [Bookchin, 1995, 16 & 57].

While there are similarities between the social/lifestylist and class struggle/individualist divisions they are not synonymous - some who claim to be social anarchists dismiss class struggle activity. Class struggle anarchist groups recognise that in areas where economic oppression is primary, specific agents - namely those who are economically subjugated (what is normally referred to as the 'working class') take priority.

Chapters Four and Five identify and classify a wide variety of contemporary anarchist organisational methods and their (anti-)political tactics.⁵ The division between workplace/community organisation and tactics is explored. The ideal type is used to assess anarchist formal structures and their favoured methods. Many tactics and organisational structures previously condemned as inconsistent with anarchism are shown to be reconcilable, in particular contexts, with the prefigurative archetype, as oppressed subjects themselves are shown to acting without mediation, to confront their oppression in accordance with non-hierarchical principles. Other stratagems, although normally approved of, are fundamentally flawed as they create a vanguard acting on behalf of the oppressed.

Autonomists and situationists, as well as the liberatory activities of non-formally aligned resisters such as certain urban rioters and the miners' hit squads, can be seen to share key characteristics with class struggle anarchist groupings. These organisations and their tactics can be said to form a semi-coherent subject for this thesis as they meet four hesitantly proposed criteria. First, a complete rejection of capitalism and the market economy, which demarcates anarchism from reformist politics; second, an egalitarian concern for the interests and freedoms of others as part of creating non-hierarchical social relations; third, a complete rejection of state power and other quasi-state mediating forces, which distinguishes libertarianism from Leninism. The final criterion, alongside the other three, is the basis for the framework used here for assessing anarchist methods: a recognition that means have to prefigure ends. The first three criteria contain elements of 'anti-representation', dismissing oppressive practices that construct identities through market principles of class or wealth, party or nation, leader or citizen. The last criterion, prefiguration, is indicative of the reflexivity of anarchist methods which not only react against existing conditions but are also 'self-creative'. These four criteria create the 'ideal type' used to assess the actions of contemporary groups.

These four identifiable standards contrast with the view of the political philosopher David Miller, who considered that the confusing multiplicity associated with anarchism meant that unlike marxism,⁶ it had no identifying core assumptions and consequently could barely be called a political ideology [Miller, 1984, 3]. The multitude of often incompatible interpretations of 'anarchism' would give Miller good grounds for this assertion. The label has been applied to Stirnerite individualism, Tolstoyan Christian pacifism, the hyper-capitalism of the Libertarian Alliance, as well as the class-struggle traditions of anarchist communism, anarcho-syndicalism, situationism and autonomist marxism.⁷ By limiting the scope to the revolutionary socialist variants of libertarianism however, a distinctive group of ideas and practices can be identified through the aforementioned four criteria.

It was necessary to provide criteria to limit the scope of the subjects for analysis. Choosing appropriate standards for classifying political movements is always a precarious business. It is fate will be determined less by what he said, and by what he meant by what he said, than by what others said he said. That is why his legacy is of more moment for our purposes than the exegesis of his writings [May, 1994, 18n].

Consequently throughout the thesis I refer to 'marxism' to avoid demarcating one particular version as 'Marxist', especially as so many versions are in conflict. For instance the autonomist marxist tradition of Toni Negri, Harry Cleaver, et. al. has more in common with class struggle anarchism than with the Leninism. Although there are differences between the various Leninisms, the main issues for debate in this work, such as the central role of the Party and the strong versions of economic determinism are fundamental features of all Leninists. 'Leninism', as result, retains its capital letter.

⁷Capital letters are used to describe formal members of groups and lower case for writers or activists in a particular tradition. So Guy Debord is a 'Situationist' (as he was a member of the SI) but the magazine Here and Now is 'situationist'. Movements called after an actual person retain an upper case so it is 'Bakunist' and 'Leninist'. The exception is for those named after Marx, as these are so diverse that to categorise all of these under especially difficult to select appropriate measures for classifying class struggle anarchism as it constantly responds to changing circumstances and approves multiple forms of revolt. Yet there is a strong case for classifying class struggle anarchism using the four criteria. Historically, anarchist groups can be traced by using these standards. John Quail in his account of the growth of British anarchism characterises anarchism using the first three criteria: 'Anarchism is a political philosophy which states that it is both possible and desirable to live in a society based on co-operation, not coercion, organised without hierarchy [....]. More specifically it marks a rejection of the political structure which the bourgeoisie sought to establish - parliamentary democracy' [Quail, 1978, x]. And the commitment to these principles can be found in libertarian groups themselves. For instance in the definition of anarchism provided in 1967 by the Solidarity group⁸ and in the shorter explanation in the Anarchist 1993 Yearbook. There are other statements proclaiming the same norms in the 'Aims and Principles' sections of most anarchist publications [see for instance Organise! No. 33, 19 & Class War, No. 39, 13].⁹

Even with this clarification of the four criteria, the label 'anarchism' and other vital parts of the revolutionary lexicon have been subject to criticism by proponents and opponents of socialist libertarian traditions. Andy and Mark Anderson claim that the terminology of the revolutionary socialist groups under consideration is too vague and the objectives consequently obscure, thereby making debate confusing and alienating [Anderson & Anderson, 1991e, 3].¹⁰ The Andersons' objections are not a singular capitalised title would be misleading.

¹⁰ Such a problem concerning definition is not new, without foundation, but a recognisable set of groups, movements and events can be categorised as part of the class struggle variant of anarchism. The differentiation is not precise or absolute. Groups such as the 'Earth First!' (EF!) initially saw themselves as unconcerned with issues of class and capitalism but, in Britain especially, many EF! sections have come to regard environmental activism as interwoven with more general class struggles.¹¹

It should be noted that occasionally one trend or other would fall outside the criteria. To use more inclusive criteria would mean drawing up principles so vague as to be meaningless [Morland, 1997, 12 & 20-1]. Anarchism's constant evolution, its suspicion of universal tenets and its localist philosophy risk making any gauge for one epoch or region seem wholly inappropriate to another. Yet these criteria do hold remarkably well, even when applied to just a small selection of groups within a relatively short time-span in a geographically specific.

The region under analysis for this study is the area known up until 1922 as the 'British Isles'. The reason for the inclusion of the 26 County WSM¹² is not due to any imperialist bias but a recognition that English, Scottish, Welsh and the Six Counties anarchist histories are intimately linked, partly through anti-imperialism, with that of the 26 the first edition of Seymour's The Anarchist discusses confusion surrounding the term as indeed does early copies of Kropotkin's Freedom [The Anarchist, March 1985, 2].

counties.¹³ The WSM are also important as they represent one version of a particular type of class struggle grouping. These groups use the controversial centralising organisational principles outlined in the Organisational Platform of the Libertarian Communists.¹⁴

The definition of 'Britishness' is geographical rather than cultural, to take into account the contribution of immigrants. One of the first anarchist newspaper printed in this country was written in German, not English. Amongst the earliest major groups of anarchists in Britain was 'Der Arbeter Frint' (The Workers' Friend) comprised of Jewish refugees fleeing from tsarist persecution, who carried out their activities in Yiddish.¹⁵ In the 1930s the arrival of Italian and Spanish activists inspired and influenced anarchism in Britain.

The concentration on the British Isles should not overlook the fact that anarchism is an internationalist movement, and organisations often reflect this. In the past Der Arbeter Frint was a member of the cross-channel Federation of Jewish Anarchist Groups in Britain and Paris, and the SolFed is part of the International Workers' Association of anarcho-syndicalists which has the Spanish CNT as its most famous and influential part. The AF are part of a wide libertarian communist network including groups on three continents. Other organisations have links, either formal or informal, with like-minded movements in other parts of the world.

¹⁴ The AWG, who also advocated this structure, lasted just four years and disbanded in 1992.

Oppression is understood to be contextual and based on opposing local oppressions rather than a singular universal form of domination that determines all hierarchies. As a result it is not possible to represent the whole British anarchist movement, through one or two key groups or individuals, or through particular canonical texts. The anarchist movement, to quote the activist George Cores 'was due to the activities of working men and women most of whom did not appear as orators or as writers in printed papers' [Cores, 1992, 6]. The types of material considered and the approach taken here, reflects anarchism's concern for localised micropolitical, as well as more extensive, global narratives.

An accurate account of anarchism requires a combination of the actors own perceptions and an appreciation of the wider context [Taylor, 1993, 23 & Bernstein, 1976, 69].¹⁶ An account based only on the actors' own perceptions would omit the broader contextualising relationship which helps shape these beliefs [Melucci, 1996, 15]. For example, individual soldiers may not be in a position to fully understand their role in the wider military conflict [Gorz, 1983, 30]. A comprehensive account of warfare, nonetheless, must still take into account the experiences of service personnel.

The views of anarchist participants are derived from the propaganda sources created by the groups identified above and the analysis of their activities through self-reports, participant-observation and supporting interviews with members of class struggle libertarian groupings. Materials collected and analyzed are by no means complete or exhaustive and no such holding exists. The British Library and Colindale newspaper depository have a few of the articles referred to. The specialist Kate Sharpley Library (KSL) has many anarchist periodicals, but here too there are absences. Accounts of the main groups have tried to be as complete as possible but the localised nature of many anarchist publications has meant that the concentration has been on those that attempt to be nationally available (but may fall well short). Additionally it must be admitted that an element of chance and arbitrariness is unavoidable in the selection of material.

By undertaking a critique that is sensitive to, and draws heavily upon, the accounts of the activists themselves, the objective is to avoid some of the pitfalls identified by Simon Sadler in the introduction to his book The Situationist City. Sadler notes that university-based researchers engaging in analysis of revolutionary movements, (in his case the Situationist International) provoke numerous criticisms from revolutionary activists. These reproaches suggest that the researcher is misrepresenting the subject by using the tools and debates that are the concerns of an intellectual elite rather than the participants themselves, or that the author is domesticating the revolutionary potential of their subject by integrating it into academic discourse. My response differs from Sadler's reply, although acknowledging the veracity of his rejoinder that the university can provide a means to transmit such ideas, and that the small magazines of the purist revolutionary groups rarely avoid the elitism of which they accuse others. It would be disingenuous to deny that universities (especially the ones which assisted this project) were not elite institutions and that any research, even that which is self-consciously radical, is going to be damned not only by association but risks only being of interest or available to those who seek to control autonomous, egalitarian activity. Nonetheless efforts have been made to resist the reduction of anarchism into a subject of study for the dominant class, and to this end a particular methodology is employed.

The procedure developed has at its core the recognition that anarchism is primarily a mode of revolutionary action rather than a set of theoretical texts. As a result this book concentrates on the materials of the revolutionary groups, their magazines, newspapers, journals, books, pamphlets, posters, stickers, graffiti and web-sites as well as describing their actions. This stands in contrast to the approach of many critics of anarchism, such as James Joll, George Woodcock and Peter Marshall who have examined the movement through the supposed canon of the classical anarchist thinkers. But few contemporary anarchists are directly inspired by these writers. It would be surprising if the thousands participating in libertarian events had read the standard texts by Michael Bakunin, Pierre-Joseph Proudhon or Emma Goldman. Consequently the works of the classical writers are referred to, but only in order to elucidate the explanations of more recent activists.

The concentration on both written texts as well as action may seem to contradict the dubious distinction, problematised in the following paragraphs, between writings and events. Anarchists tend to consider that the latter to be more important than the former (in certain academics circles they reverse this order by placing greater emphasis on classical texts). George McKay comments that the environmentalists he champions give pre-eminence to deeds over words [McKay, 1998, 11-2]. This distinction occurs in much anarchist self-analysis. One of the founders of Class War, Ian Bone, for instance, prioritises action as most desirable and criticises former comrades for spending too long on theorising rather than acting. Bone himself is criticised in similar terms by his libertarian opponents [Bone, 1997, 8-9 & N and Others. 1997, 12-4]. Yet the distinction between deeds and words does not stand up to rigorous scrutiny.

The philosopher J. L. Austin fundamentally collapsed the opposition between speaking and acting in How to do Things with Words. Speaking is an act in itself and not only an abstract expression of meaningful (or meaningless) propositions. Speaking/writing is not just a dispassionate exercise in academic communication but is also an action. Anarchists, including Bone, have also acknowledged this.¹⁷ They reject the rights of organised fascists to speak publicly, for example, as such activities are also recognised as provocative acts and expressions of power. Nationalist newspaper sales, leaflets and public oratory are not merely ways of broadcasting ideas and means for encouraging debate. As speech-acts they also serve to marginalise and exclude sections of society and mark geographical regions as restricted to privileged groups.¹⁸ Speech-acts then are performative. So too events have a communicative purpose that can be read textually. An example of direct action, such as tearing up genetically modified crops, can be read as a symbol of wider ecological concern or as a provocative inquiry that questions rights to land ownership. The apparent distinction between theorising and action is really about who is involved in their performance and those whom the act intends to influence.

If speech-acts are activities just like any other, then on what grounds can this study justify concentrating on contemporary events and propaganda, and to downplay classical theoretical texts? The answer involves acknowledging the importance of the identities of the agents involved in the actions and the types of agent appealed to. It is on the grounds of the involvement and identity of active and affected agents that distinctions are drawn between propaganda and theorising. Theorising is interpreted by Bone as discourse created by and towards elite groups (especially those not involved in the events to which the speech acts refer). The greater the distance from those involved or intended to be involved in the acts, the greater its theoretic designation. This explains Bone's disapproval of pure theorising, such as discussions in and between revolutionary groups and the organisation of conferences aimed at a select group, over and above the participation of the wider revolutionary agent. Action, then for Bone aims at and aspires to include, as autonomous participants, wider groups of individuals - in particular the revolutionary agent of change. Thus certain speech-acts, such as leafleting and speaking tours in response to the activities of organised racists in working class communities, are forms of political action [Class War No. 54, 7]. The same activities in a different context, with a different range of influence, might be dismissed as theorising. Publication and distribution of tracts by the classical anarchist thinkers was originally part of popular agitation. However in the principle period addressed by this study (1984 - 1999), the publication of these same writers is more often associated with distribution to a specialised, academically-privileged audience and therefore designated pejoratively as theorising [Black Flag, No. 203, 30]. To re-cap, the identity of the agents involved in direct action is fundamental to the demarcation between anarchist and non-anarchist variants. In anarchist direct action the agents are those immediately affected by the problem under consideration, whereas other forms of direct action promote benevolent (and sometimes malevolent) paternalism.

This thesis attempts to describe contemporary anarchist movements and to show they are significant and important forms of (anti-)political thought. The form of assessment I have developed, aims to be sympathetic to, and consistent with, the evaluative techniques of anarchism itself (see above). Yet, it does not avoid all the problems associated with 'academic' research despite the fact for a significant period this thesis was written external to the university. This was not a matter of principle but due to the unpopularity of the subject, matched maybe by a similar suspicion of the author, from grant awarding bodies.

I am concerned to avoid the misrepresentation of past and existing groups, and more importantly to ensure that no-one's security is jeopardised by inadvertently making known sources that desire anonymity. Consequently, I am grateful to the many friends in working class and/or anarchist groups who have assisted me and read parts or all of this text to check for such unwarranted disclosures and factual inaccuracies. Nonetheless there are still many weaknesses within the text that I am unable to resolve. Reductionism and omission has unavoidably occurred - even in a document of this size. My apparent tone of confidence in providing a linear narrative is similarly inappropriate for a movement that is contingent, fluid and diffuse. As a result, there are many groups, journals and individuals who have been unjustly excluded (or included to their chagrin) or whose original, thoughtful and inspiring ideas and actions have been diminished or overlooked. In such instances I offer my regrets and hope that these aberrations do not discourage any 'senseless acts of beauty' and that my deficiencies cause others to create superior accounts.

History of British Anarchisms

Chapter One

Histories of British Anarchism

Foreword

This chapter deals with the histories of British anarchism from its earliest manifestations. These are included not just for the sake of completeness, but also because they characterise some of the debates inherited by contemporary libertarians. A brief history also helps to illustrate that anarchism is not simply an isolated national phenomenon, but developed out of worldwide movements, which prefigured libertarians' internationalism. The different manifestations in which class-struggle anarchism has appeared is an indication of its multifaceted tactical and theoretical formulations as well as the wide set of contexts in which it has developed.

The main focus of the thesis is not a history of British anarchism. As such this chapter has been constructed using a number of secondary sources. There is no single text that covers the history of British anarchism, so this account draws upon a large number of competing, partial accounts. For the pre-First World War period, William Fishman's and John Quail's chronologies of Jewish immigrant and indigenous radicalism were used alongside the general histories of anarchism provided by George Woodcock, Peter Marshall and James Joll. Also of significant relevance were the first hand accounts of activists of the period such as Rudolph Rocker and Enricco Malatesta and the pamphlets reissued by the KSL written by militants themselves such as Wilf McCartney and George Cores. These latter accounts focus on the lived experiences of the ordinary activist rather than the activities of the leading personalities.

Many scholarly works, such as Fishman (1975), stop at the First World War. Quail ends his in the 1920s with the rise of the hegemonic influence of the Communist Party. 1939 is the terminal date of Woodcock's first edition of Anarchism.¹ Even later works such as Marshall (1992) that do include a few brief mentions of more contemporary groups do so scantily and inaccurately.² Texts by contemporary and near-contemporary activists and organisations provide more comprehensive information. Class struggle newspapers (indicated by italics) and magazines (in bold) report their events and those of other liberatory movements. The founders of the ABC and Black Flag, Stuart Christie and Albert Meltzer, in their autobiographies include accounts of anarchist movements as well as in Meltzer's own histories of British anarchism. The critics of anarchism who have produced their versions of events, such as Leninist publications (Socialist Review, Red Action) provide another set of sources. Reference is also made to reports found in general histories of Britain in which anarchists have played a small part, for instance Dangerfield (1997), Hewison (1986) and Fountain (1988).

1. Problems in Writing Anarchist Histories

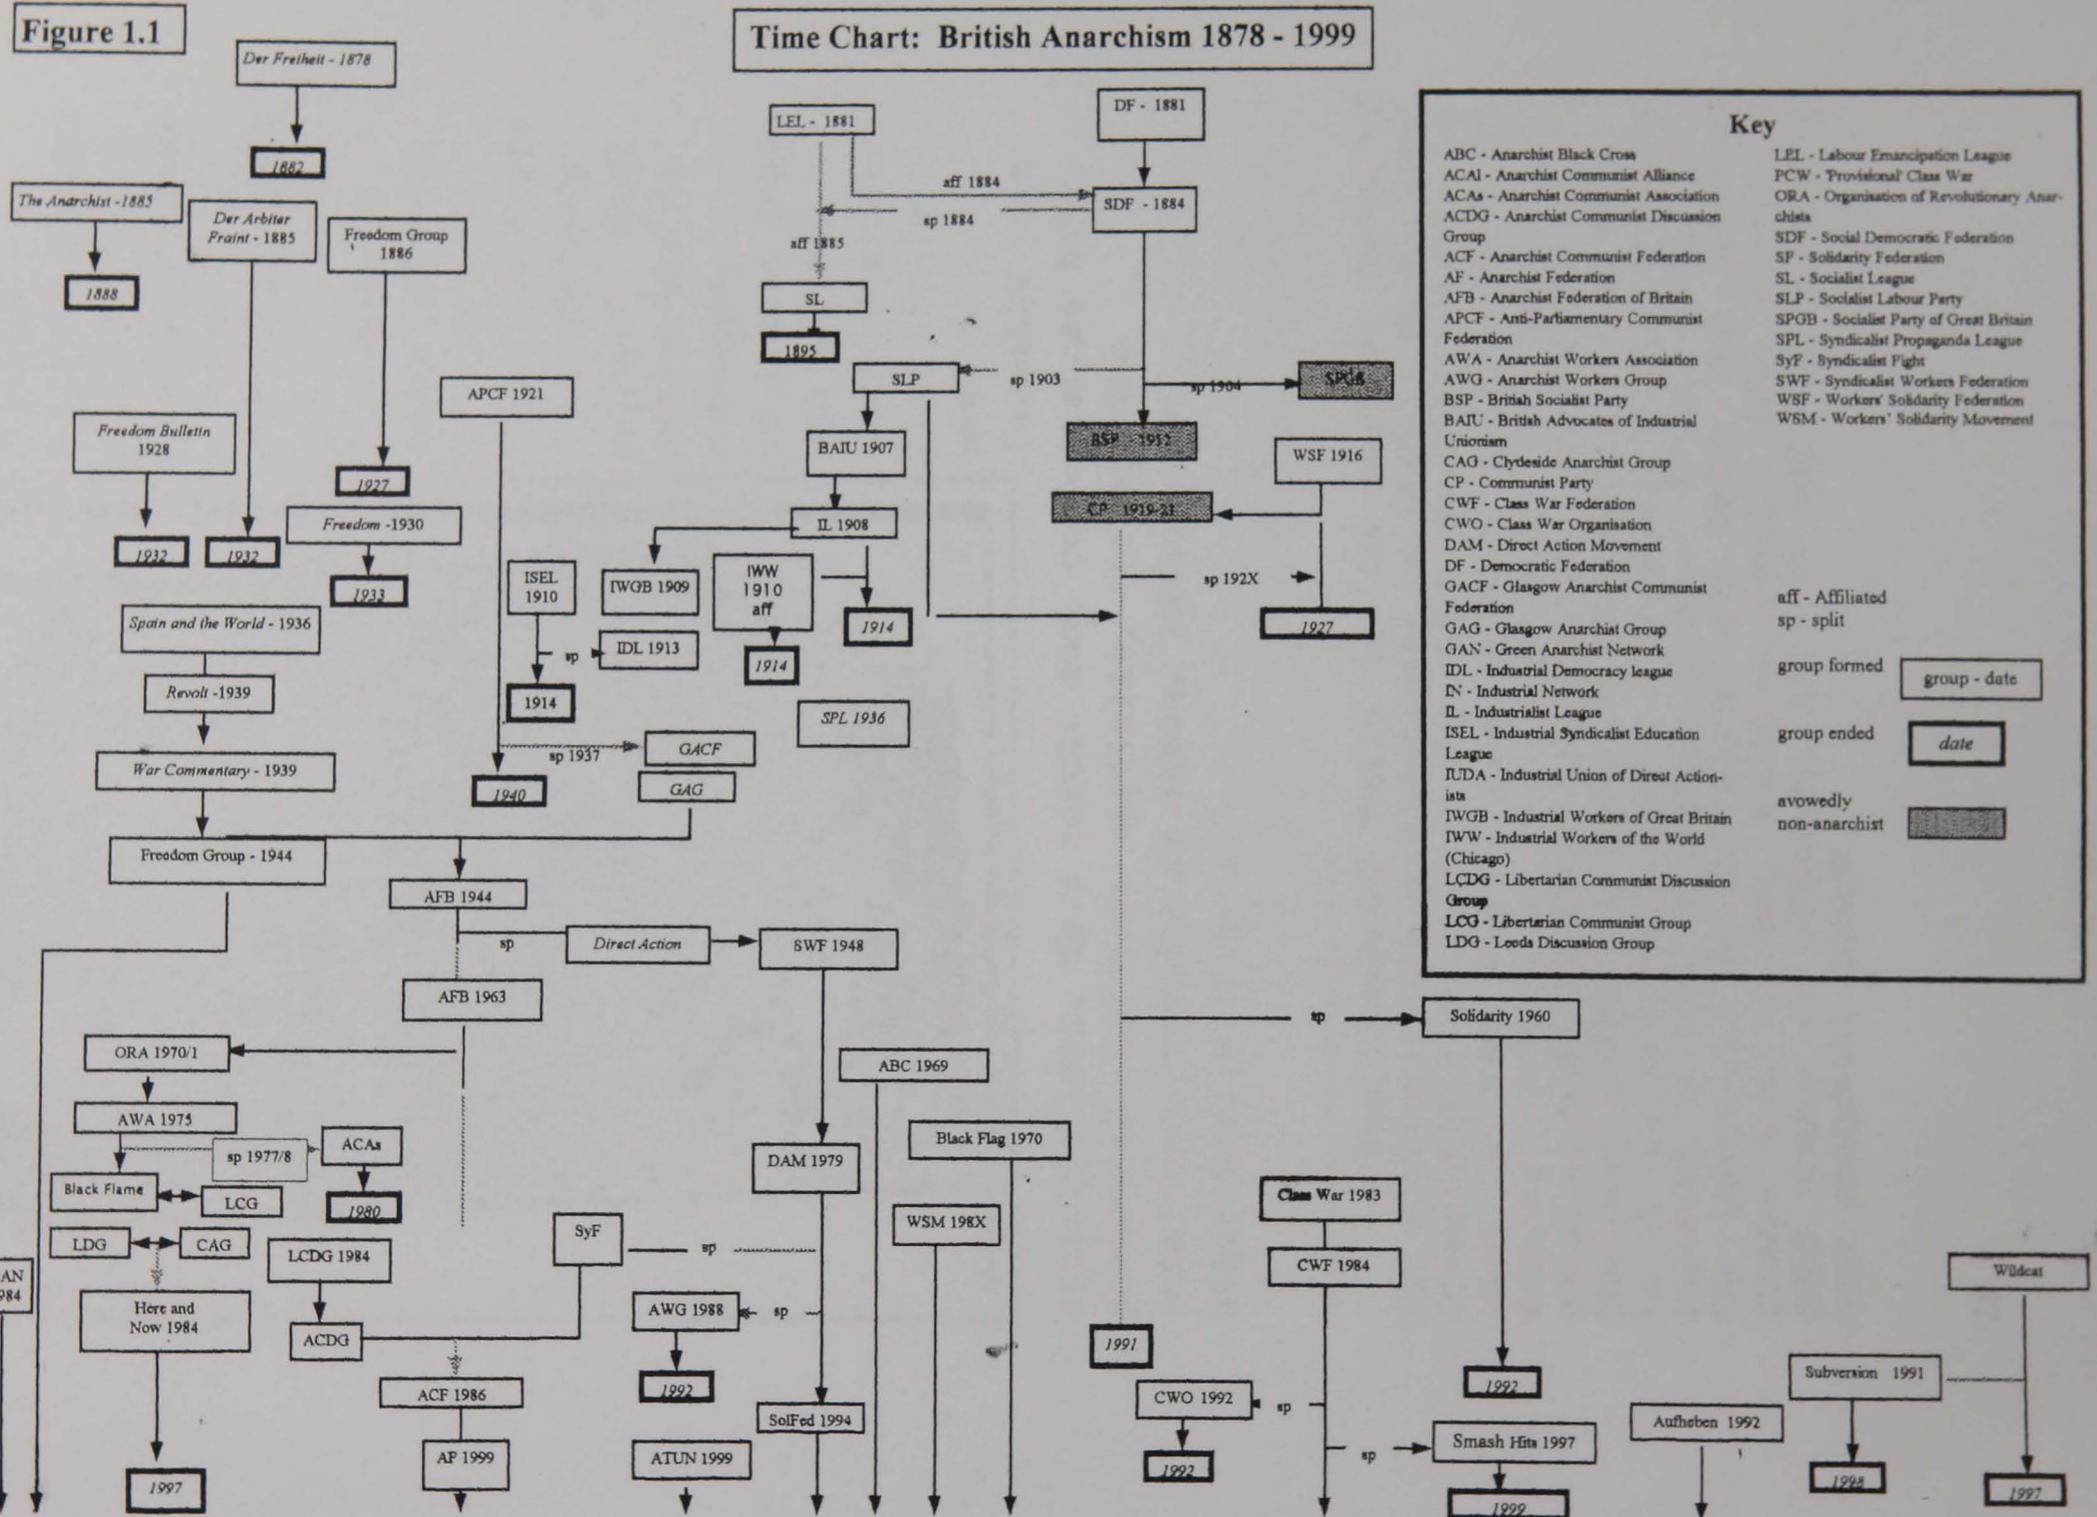

There are enormous difficulties with writing a history of British anarchism and the histogram, I've devised (fig 1.1.), has unavoidably reproduced some of them. The confusion of groups, with different organisations having the same title, groups affiliating and disaffiliating, appearing, disappearing and reappearing in quick succession, are by no means unique to anarchism but are, nevertheless, significant features of this political movement. These are consequences of their particular forms of organisation. Their conception of an socialist and communist counterparts. Marxist-Leninist groups consider their parties to have a vital historical role and consequently organisational integrity is vital for their revolutionary project.³ Many anarchists by contrast, including those who are not individualists, find little need to formally join organisations. As a result some commentators have presented anarchism spatially, through the interconnectedness of ideas, rather than historically (fig. 1.2.).

Anarchist groups stress that as far as possible, formal structures should develop the autonomy of participants, so groups are often federal in structure and maintain a large amount of local initiative. Thus, small groups that nevertheless may have been hugely influential in their locale, have unfortunately been excluded from the histogram. Tracking the multitude of such smaller groups, influential though they may be on particular events, is an almost impossible task. McKay in his history of post-1960s counterculture comments on the difficult task of developing a master narrative out of the autonomous events and networks which criss-cross the country; but which nevertheless represent an identifiable 'bricolage or patchwork' of oppositional activity and culture [McKay, 1996, 11-12]. To add to the confusion, prior to the Bolshevik Revolution the divisions within the socialist camps were not hard and fast. Many groups, such as the SDF, contained both statist marxists and anarchists amongst its ranks, and numerous individuals alternated between the two movements. Some did not recognise a distinction or straddled both camps.⁴ Even in the 1970s the Libertarian Communist Group (LCG) worked with the non-anarchist Black Flame group and ended up entering the Labour Party.⁵

2. Origins

The origins of British anarchism are not clear-cut. Many different movements have been posited as precursors; from the Peasant's Revolt led by Wat

⁵ Even today the Welsh Socialists (Cymru Goch) admit that their works are influenced by Class War's introductory tract This is Class War, although the Welsh group's roots are in the Welsh Socialist Republican Movement, a splinter from Plaid Cymru, a parliamentary party. Cymru Goch are viewed with suspicion by some within the wider libertarian camp [The Welsh Socialists, 1996, 3 & Do or Die No. 8, 1999, 335].

Tyler [Everett, nd, 3], to Winstanley's Diggers [Woodcock, 1975, 443] and the Chartists [Quail, 1978, xi]. There has been a desire to create a respectable historical tradition for anarchism. This aspiration often leads to the creation of inappropriate forebears and an inaccurate account of the movement. In his history of anarchism Marshall cites figures as diverse as the conservative theorist Edmund Burke, the nationalist Tom Paine and even the Christian messiah as 'forerunners of anarchism' - a revolutionary, anti-state, egalitarian movement [Marshall, 1992, 133-9, 74-85]. Certainly many of these can be regarded as influences on anarchism as they have inspired many contemporary activists (for instance Wat Tyler featured in the publicity of anti-poll tax campaigns), rather than libertarian themselves. Anarchism is, in part, a product of industrialism and post-industrialism, modernity and post-modernity. Actions from preceding eras can be emancipatory and conform to the basic criteria of anarchism, as outlined in the introduction, the subject identities are not those associated with anarchism.

3. The Heroic Period: A History of British Anarchism up to 1914

Anarchism in Britain had foreign origins but would not have taken root unless there was a native born population receptive to its message and prepared by its own historical experiences. It grew from small and exotic beginnings to a major cause of concern for the British State and an influence on breaking down divisions of race and ethnicity.⁶

The first person in the modern epoch to use the phrase 'anarchist' in a non-pejorative sense was Pierre-Joseph Proudhon who, in his book, What is Property?, declared in 1846, 'I am an Anarchist.' In this text he positioned anarchism as a legitimate political movement:

"[Y]ou are a republican." - Republican, yes, but this word defines nothing. Res publica; this is the public thing. Now, whoever is concerned with public affairs, under whatever form of government may call himself a republican. Even kings are republicans. "Well, then you are a democrat?" - No. - "What! You are a monarchist?" - No. "A constitutionalist?" - God forbid - "You are then an aristocrat?" - Not at all. - "You want mixed government?" - Still less. - "So then what are you?" I am an anarchist [Proudhon, 1994, 204-5].

And

Although a friend of order, I am, in every sense of the term, an anarchist [Ibid, 205].

Proudhon gained much support and notoriety in France for his views, yet his ideas remained, for the most part, confined to his native country. The interest shown by Karl Marx and his reclamation of the name 'anarchist' was the main cause for his importance in the British context. It was Michael Bakunin who spread the ideas of anarchism [Thomas, 1980, 249]. It was Bakunin's not Proudhon's name which appeared in the earliest editions of the anarchist newspapers in Britain [The Anarchist: A Revolutionary Review, Number 1, March 1885, 1].

If the first criterion, self-identification as anarchists, is used to assess the start of the British anarchist movement, then it starts as late as the 1880s and is based on immigrant personalities and influences [Woodcock, 1975, 415]. The Jewish immigrants who settled in Britain having fled Tsarist persecution were the foundation of a strong anarchist movement, as indeed were similar communities in France and America. Furthermore Britain also received an influx of Anarchists from the Continent, fleeing oppression from their countries of origin, amongst them Peter Kropotkin, Errico Malatesta, Johann Most and Rudolph Rocker. The models of anarchism had many international sources but found advocates and sympathisers amongst the native-born as well as recent immigrant communities. After initial hostility there was mutual support between the ethnic groups.

One of those radical traditions was the Chartist movement, the precursor to the British socialist movement from which the anarchist movement developed. Although the heyday of the Chartists was between 1838-1848, it continued to have an identifiable influence later into the 19th century. Joe Lane and Frank Kitz, later to become active in the early anarchist movement, were supporters of the Chartists, the latter having taken part in the Hyde Park rally and disorders [Quail, 1978, 5]. Other broad-based socialist groups and movements grew out of the Chartist clubs, amongst them the Democratic Federation (DF) and the Social Democratic Federation (SDF). These are relevant to the history of British anarchism because Britain, unlike other parts of Europe, such as France, had not made such clear-cut distinctions between anarchists and other versions of radical egalitarianism. This remained the case up until the Bolshevik revolution. Despite the infamous split between Michael Bakunin and Karl Marx in the First International in 1871 many working class activists admired both anarchist and orthodox socialist personalities.⁷

It was out of the DF and SDF that Lane and Kitz launched the Labour Emancipation League (LEL), which according to the ACF (whose account of this period draws upon Quail): 'was in many ways an organisation that represented the transition of radical ideas from Chartism to revolutionary socialism' [Organise! No. 42, Spring 1996, 11]. The LEL created the Socialist League (SL) which distributed Kropotkin's Freedom, although there was mutual suspicion between the anarchists in the League and those of the Freedom Group [Organise!, No. 42, Spring 1996, 12]. Groups such as the DF, SDF and then the SL contained both more orthodox (parliamentary) socialists, anarchists and those who flitted between the two positions as the radicals Cores and McCartney explain [Cores, 1992e, 3-4 & McCartney, 1992, 8]. This fluidity between marxist and anarchist movements also indicates a culture of solidarity in pursuit of socialist causes.

The first of the influential foreign revolutionaries to come to Britain was Johann Most. He epitomised one of the ways in which anarchism emerged from the socialist movement. He was originally a radical member of the Social Democratic Party, an elected member of the Reichstag from 1874 to 1878, but moved to a more explicitly anarchist position as he grew older, and he is widely regarded as a leading proponent of 'propaganda by deed', violent direct action. Following a contretemps with Bismark, Most was forced to flee Berlin and arrived in London in 1878. Here he published his newspaper Freiheit in 1879, originally subtitled 'The Organ of Social Democracy', but through 1880 more anarchist articles were published - by 1882 it was subtitled 'an Organ of Revolutionary Socialists'. Freiheit thereby stakes a strong claim to be the first anarchist newspaper printed in Britain, although it was intended for export back to Germany.

3.1. Age of Terror

On March 15, 1881, Most held a rally to celebrate the assassination of the Tsar Alexander II that had taken place earlier that year. Four days later, he also wrote an editorial in praise of the killing. In

Most's direct and lurid style, which finds its echo in early editions of Class War and Lancaster Bomber of more recent times, he wrote:

One of the vilest tyrants corroded through and through by corruption is no more [.... the bomb] fell at the despot's feet, shattered his legs, ripped open his belly and inflicted many wounds [....] Conveyed to his palace, and for an hour and a half in the greatest of suffering, the autocrat meditated on his guilt. Then he died as he deserved to die - like a dog [Q. Most, Trautmann, 1980, 52].

For this, Most was arrested for incitement to murder, and was indicted at Bow Street Magistrates Court. The subsequent trial at the Central Criminal Court, the later appeal and the sentence of sixteen months caused much press and public interest, especially as the conviction was considered a restriction on the freedom of the press. The newspaper reports of the trial brought anarchism to a wider public. A week after he was released from prison Most emigrated to New York, taking his periodical with him. However, he did leave behind a group of committed radicals that sought to promote socialism through direct action.

Most's dramatic support for violent direct action was more fully explained in his book The Science of Revolutionary Warfare, which also gave a detailed account of how to pursue well-prepared guerrilla attacks. In this way it is similar, although more scientifically accurate, to the more infamous Anarchist Cookbook (Powell, 1989) Propaganda by deed was frequent on the continent of Europe, the highlights were:

- 1881, the assassination of Russian Tsar Alexander II by the People's Will.

- 1881, attempt on the life Gambetta, a Republican leader, by Emile Florain.
- 1883-4, bombings, in France, of churches and employers houses.
- 1884, a more accurate attempt on the Mother Superior of the convent at Marseilles in by Louis Chaves.
- 1891-2, bombing campaign against judiciary and police by Ravachol (ne Koenigstein).
- January 1894, nail bomb attack on the Chamber of Deputies in Paris, by August Vaillant.
- 1900 King Umberto of Italy shot by Gaetano Bresci.

America also faced similar incidents, following state repression of industrial militants. These included Alexander Berkman's attempt to take the life of Henry Clay Frick in 1892 and the 1901 assassination of President McKinley by Leon Czolgosz. These events promoted the association of anarchism with terrorism throughout Europe and America. There was a general perception that a worldwide conspiracy of assassins existed [Diamond, 1994, 72]. Although individual anarchist assassins were aware of the deeds of others from the libertarian press, there was no formal conspiracy.

Because in Britain political repression was less severe than elsewhere in Europe, propaganda by mouth was possible, meaning that propaganda by deed was less frequent. However, this is not to say that the tactic of terror promulgated by Most was utterly neglected here. The Walsall anarchists Charles, Cailles and Battola were accused of conspiracy to conduct a terror campaign and held on explosives charges. How far there was any real conspiracy for a French style bombing campaign or whether it was a pre-emptive strike by the nascent British political police fearing such a campaign, remains a matter of some dispute.⁸ More famously there was the 1894 bomb in Greenwich Park, killing the anarchist who was planting it. The incident at Greenwich was immortalised in Joseph Conrad's 1902 novel The Secret Agent. Other popular, fictive accounts of anarchists as terrorists were Henry James The Princess Casamassima (1886), H. G. Wells' The Stolen Bacillus (1894) and G. K. Chesterton's The Man Who Was Thursday (1908) [Marshall, 1992, 629]. Journalistic accounts treated anarchism and terrorism synonymously, such that terrorist acts were attributed to anarchists, no matter who carried them out.

The terroristic strand of anarchist activity was also evident in the incidents surrounding Leesma (Flame) cell number 5, a group of anti-tsarist revolutionaries originally from the Letts province of Russia were involved in the December 1910 Sidney Street siege. The robbery at a jewellery shop to provide funds for comrades back home went awry. In making their escape the thieves shot dead three policeman and injured two more. The revolutionaries were tracked down to a house at 100 Sidney Street in Stepney in the East End (now a multi-storey residential block of flats called 'Siege House'). The events ended with Winston Churchill, the then Home Secretary, overseeing the employment of Scots Guards to support the police, creating a combined force of 1000-strong to capture two cornered men, Fritz Svaars and William Sokolow. Peter Piaktow (Peter-the-painter), who is most frequently associated with the events, had already fled. Svaars and Sokolow died in the house [Clarke, 1983, 50-53]. The incidents entered East-End mythology: parents would threaten their recalcitrant offspring that if they failed to behave 'Peter-the-Painter would get them'. Unsuccessful efforts were made to further incriminate the general anarchist movement. The Italian militant, engineer and electrician, Malatesta was charged with involvement in the crime, as he had innocently provided the gang with the equipment to make a cutting torch, but he was released [Clarke, 1983, 40].

Propaganda by deed was just one form of anarchist activity, although it was the one most strongly associated with them. This was not because anarchists placed greater emphasis on this rather than other tactics, but that they were unusual in accepting it as a legitimate tactic, under appropriate circumstances. Propagandists of all types, including Kropotkin, supported it. So although anarchists, like other socialist groupings at the time were also active in industrial organisation, it was the uniqueness of their occasional advocacy of propaganda by deed that was their most distinctive characteristic. Even some of the French illegalists, who mainly used propaganda by deed, regarded it as just one method amongst many others [Jacobs, 1995, 36].

3.2. Workers Arise: Anarchism and Industrial Organisation

Anarchist industrial organisation had a great influence upon the Jewish immigrants in Britain who had fled from Tsarist Russia. The arrival of these refugees had been met with a marked increase in popular xenophobia. Even the anarchists had been promoters of racism and anti-semitism. Proudhon and his French utopian socialist colleague, Charles Fourier, had argued that Jews were habitually middlemen and exploiters, incapable of common feeling with their fellow man. The incoming immigrants, desperate for work, were blamed by socialists for strikebreaking and under-cutting pay rates.

Socialists and trade unionists such as Ben Tillett were anti-refugee.⁹ By 1888, 43 trade unions had 'condemned unrestricted immigration' [Fishman, 1975, 77]. Many of the native British workers groups repeated the stereotypes of Jewry as the parasitical enemies of the gentile population, found in the remarks of Proudhon and Fourier. In the East End, where many of the immigrants settled, the anti-semitism of established left wing groups assisted in the formation of the ultra-patriotic British Brother's League. A petition demanding the exclusion of immigrants from Britain attracted 45,000 signatures in Tower Hamlets alone [Fishman, 1975, 247]. Against this background of anti-alien prejudice Aron Lieberman, a Lithuanian socialist, tried to organise the immigrant poor, first to help them in their plight and second to show the established workers' movement, who made no attempt to support the incomers, that the refugees were capable of socialism. The principles of his Hebrew Socialist Union had much in common with anarchism [Fishman, 1975, 104]. Lieberman's attempts, however, were thwarted by the ruling class within the Jewish community (Jewish Chronicle, Board of Guardians and Chief Rabbi's Office) with the support of the 'local' authorities. The Jewish Chronicle libelled the movement, claiming that it was a front for Christian missionaries. This constituted a particularly effective piece of propaganda, as it questioned the integrity of the movement. It served to unite with the dominant culture's anti-semitic views that Jewry and socialism were incompatible, and scared off potential recruits as the immigrants had fled a tyrannical Christian regime. The Chief Rabbi's agents also deliberately disturbed the meetings, so that the police were called and the

One of Lieberman's fellow socialist Morris Winchevsky set up the first Yiddish socialist journal in Britain, Poilishe Yidl (The Polish Jew). He left when it supported the parliamentary candidature of the anti-socialist Sam Montagu, and set up in its place Der Arbeter Frint. It quickly gained a distinctive anarchist outlook, promoting equality, liberty, atheism and anti-capitalism. During the period of 1885 to 1896, Der Arbeter Frint group had gained the support of the English-speaking anarchist movement, as well as a sizeable section of the Jewish immigrant community; however it was with the assistance of Rocker that its progress was most significant. Although not Jewish, Rocker had worked with Jewish anarchists in France [Fishman, 1975, 231]. In 1895 he had arrived to stay in London and came into contact with the Jewish anarchists there. He was sympathetic to the plight of the refugees and learnt Yiddish in order to help them. In 1898, he went up to Liverpool to edit Der Freie Vort (The Free Word). Its success prompted a request from Arbeter Frint (a newspaper which had called itself from 1892 'The organ of anarchist-communism') for Rocker to come back and relaunch their paper. The editorial and presentational skills of Rocker, along with organisational and agitational abilities, transformed the Jewish movement into one of the most effective anarchist groupings in British history.

Rocker was a syndicalist, and he encouraged the tactic of organising unions. The early Der Arbeter Frint was less keen on unionisation as it regarded unions as a reformist distraction from building the immediate revolution. They had concentrated on communal agitation, particularly against rabbinical authorities. Under Rocker's lead this new organisational strategy was adopted and proved to be successful. It was particularly attractive to Jewish refugees, as the ruling elite within the ethnic community championed social peace by claiming that Jewish interests were the same, whether wealthy or poor, whereas unionism recognised the differences between employee and employer. This appealed as the severely exploited immigrant workers, facing appalling conditions for very low pay, often had an employer who was a co-religionist. Rocker's strategy gave the dissatisfied worker a voice as it recognised class division within Jewish communities.

Syndicalism was a multi-faceted organisational tactic. It demonstrated the primacy of class division over ethnic division. It was a structure which could bring about a general transformation of society by being part of a General Strike and it could provide the basic administrative framework for the running of the new society [Douglass in Ablett, Hay, Mainwaring & Rees, 1991e, 2]. In the short term it also brought about recognisable results. The unions organised effective strikes within the workshops where immigrant workers were found. The growth of radicalism meant that by 7 January 1906 the Jewish Chronicle was reporting that, 'hardly a day passes without a fresh strike breaking out.' [Q. Jewish Chronicle, Fishman, 1975, 279] However, continuing streams of immigrants, desperate and disorientated, provided an ample source of strikebreakers.

The period from 1910 to 1914 saw an increase in general industrial militancy with dockers, shipwrights, railwaymen and miners taking major strike action [Dangerfield, 1997, 194]. In 1912 when a strike of largely gentile West End tailors was called, it was feared that the Jewish tailors in the East End might break the strike. Yet Der Arbeter Fraint set to work by calling a general strike.

Rocker reports that: 'Over 8,000 Jewish workers packed the Assembly Hall... More than 3,000 stood outside' [Q. Rocker, Fishman, 1975, 295]. Within two days 13,000 tailors were out on a strike. Throughout the two weeks of the strike (approximately May 10 - 24) Der Arbeter Fraint appeared daily in order to keep workers informed of how the strike was developing. It was almost certainly the first and last (to date) daily anarchist paper in Britain. The strike was successful, immigrant and native worker struggled together to improve their lot, winning shorter hours, the abolition of piece work, and an improvement in the sanitation of their working conditions.

The SDF had been unenthusiastic about the role of trade unions, seeing them as restricted to skilled workers and being little more than friendly societies. In their place, they favoured parliamentary tactics [White, 1990a, 101]. Yet, industrial organisation was becoming more frequent after the mid 1880s. Most took a more reformist line like the Trades Union Congress (TUC) but after the turn of the century the more radical Socialist Labour Party (SLP) and an offshoot the Advocates of Industrial Unionism (AIU), were formed. These bodies increasingly prioritised revolutionary syndicalism over party building, just as the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) was doing in the USA [Challinor, 1977, 48]. This move towards industrial organisation was noticed by the main anarchist section: Kropotkin's Freedom Group started to produce a syndicalist journal The Voice of Labour [Ward, 1987, 7].

The increased industrial unrest that flared during the early part of the Twentieth Century was not caused by the syndicalists but it confirmed that such tactics were a relevant form of action [White, 1990a, 104-5]. Although propagandists for syndicalism had little influence on events there was little need for them to do so: Agitation in industry was already high and taking a syndicalist direction [Dangerfield, 1997, 191]. Noah Ablett, alongside other members of the unofficial rank-and-file reform committee of the Miners' Federation of Britain (a forerunner of the National Union of Miners), produced The Miners' Next Step. It was a clear statement of revolutionary syndicalism promoting democratic workers' bodies to run industry. A pocket of syndicalism continued in Welsh mining communities for decades, even at the height of Communist influence [Meltzer, 1976a, 38]. Fear that the revolutionary industrial message was winning support was such that by 1912 the labour organiser Tom Mann was arrested for publishing a reprint of a leaflet in his paper The Syndicalist asking troops not to shoot at strikers. The Syndicalist was the newspaper of the Industrial Syndicalist Education League and claimed a circulation of 20,000 [White, 1990a, 108-9]. The authorities clearly felt that his message might find a receptive audience.¹⁰

3.3. Propaganda and Anarchist Organisation

In the last two decades of the nineteenth century there were a number of anarchist newspapers available that began to reflect the diversity of anarchist methods and beliefs.¹¹ The aforementioned Freiheit with its links to revolutionary socialism and propaganda by deed, spawned an English language version in 1882, published to rally support for Most during his trial. Extending the tradition back into British working class struggle was the former Chartist Dan Chatterton's Commune - the Atheist

¹¹ Meltzer cites the Cosmopolitan Review dating back to the 1850s as 'the first anarchist paper'

Scorcher of 1884 [ACF, Organise!, No. 42, Spring 1996, 11]. Also published in this era was Henry Seymour's The Anarchist and a fellow individualist-anarchist paper from the USA, Benjamin Tucker's Liberty [Quail, 1978, 43]. Anarchist newspapers of all kinds provided both a means of propaganda as well as a tangible product around which an organisation could be based. The papers acted as a means of communicating with other socialist militants and with the workers (the potential agents of social change). The paper enabled the co-ordination of political events such as public meetings, rallies and strikes. Its distribution at rallies and meetings helped to put individuals in touch with groups and clubs. Successful periodicals also provided a source of finance: The tactical importance of the newspaper to the revolutionary movement is discussed in more detail in the last chapter.

The activists behind Der Arbeter Fraint created anarchist meeting-centres in Whitechapel in London. The Jubilee Street club organised lectures, not just on political topics, but on literature and the arts. These talks helped to demonstrate that ideological messages could be transmitted through many media. The club also mounted social events such as dances and attracted wider sections of working class communities into the anarchist milieu. Even if the participants did not become full anarchist militants, they were at least likely to be sympathetic. Through lectures and anarchist papers, the clubs provided a source of radical ideas and debate - an arena in which to clarify and exchange political theories. Seymour's The Anarchist, for example, printed articles discussing the differences between individualism, anarchist socialism and 'collectivist socialism' [The Anarchist, Number 1, [Meltzer, 1976a, 9].

March 1885, 2-3]. Seymour invited Kropotkin to contribute, but the association did not last long - 'the divergence between individualism and anarchist communism was too wide for the collaboration to last more than one issue' [Woodcock, 1975, 419]. Kropotkin and his followers set up their own anarchist paper, Freedom, in 1886 [Quail, 1978, 19], which became Britain's most important English-language anarchist paper for the next 35 years.

From the beginning, Freedom developed alliances with socialist and anarchist groups and periodicals throughout Britain and beyond [Freedom Vol. 1, No. 2, November 1886, 8]. In 1888 the Anarchists (represented by Kropotkin) debated with the Social Democrats (comrade Blackwell), Socialists (Allen) and individualists (Sorell), and later held meetings with George Bernard Shaw, Annie Beasant and Sidney Webb [Freedom, Vol. 2 No. 18, 70 & Freedom, Vol. 2 No. 22, 87]. By building up a wide coalition of sympathizers they could mobilise support far exceeding the formal membership of anarchist organisations. The willingness of socialists and anarchists, immigrants and locals to work together was evident in the large demonstrations against Tsarist oppression.¹² This co-operation helped Malatesta when in 1912 he faced deportation after being found guilty of criminal libel, for suggesting that an Italian called Belleli was 'a police spy'. A campaign was started to calling for his release that united labour, socialist and anarchist movements. Support came from trade unionists such as the London Trades' Council, Der Arbeter Fraint group, the Independent Labour Party (ILP) and MPs such as George Lansbury and J. C. Wedgwood [Quail, 1978,

One of the major theoretical splits has been between the industrial organisation of anarcho-syndicalism and the wider communal structures of anarchist-communism. This thesis examines this distinction, drawing out the historical reasons for its development and also for its current supercession, behind this difference were differing views on the future shape of the revolutionary society.

Distribution and exchange based on mutualism, collectivism or communism suggested different forms of organisation, different tactics and appealed to distinct types of agency.

3.4. Ideological Differences in Class Struggle Anarchism

With Kropotkin's increasing influence in British anarchism, the movement was becoming increasingly anarchist-communist. This move from mutualism and collectivism to communism was not merely a change of name as, Daniel Guerin had suggested, but a shift to a specific political ideal [Guerin, 1970, 12].

Collectivism, promoted by Bakunin, was a system of distribution whereby commodities were given a value based on the number of labour hours necessary to produce them. These were then to be exchanged with goods that had an equal labour value. A day's work by a surgeon was worth exactly the same as that done by a plumber. If barter was not possible, then labour vouchers recording the labour-value of the product would be provided and exchanged for goods. Labour was the key to value - it could be centrally determined by a collective council of labourers. Consequently collectivism was often associated with syndicalism, although some syndicalists have been anarchist-communists.

Mutualism, a system preferred by Proudhon, was an intermediary stage towards a fully collectivist economy. At the centre of the operation was the Peoples' Bank, a non-profit, non-interest charging organisation. Mutualists would join the bank, as co-operative groups of workers. Labour cheques would be converted into the currency of the period until the economy was fully mutualist. The bank would sell the members' products on the open market, with the market deciding the value of the goods rather than a committee [Hyams, 1979, 139 & 142]. As more groups entered the People's Bank, so the power of the state and capital would diminish, allowing people to enter into free contracts with each other based on the principle that, 'A day's work equals a day's work' [Hyams, 1979, 122].

Anarchist-communism was a break with collectivism and mutualism. For Kropotkin these systems were a recreation of the wage economy, with labour vouchers replacing traditional capitalist currencies [Kropotkin, 1980, 353-7]. In his introduction to anarchist-communism, Berkman explains some of the areas of disagreement between the mutualist and the communist anarchists. First, mutualists believed that an anarchist society could come about without a social revolution, through the progress of the People's Bank, while anarchist-communists argued that the ruling class would use force to protect their privileged position. Second, mutualists believed in the immutability of private property rights, while anarchist-communists hold that use determined ownership - the means of production should be free and equally accessible to all. Third, for mutualists the ideal was for a society without government, where voluntary commercial transactions would become the norm and such free-market activity would prevent the build up of monopolies. Anarchist-communists on the other hand desired the abolition of the market economy [Berkman, 1987, 29-30].

Anarchist-communists also dismissed the labour vouchers system that had been the basis for collectivism. How could equivalent labour time create equivalent value? 'Suppose the carpenter worked three hours to make a kitchen chair, while the surgeon took only half an hour to perform an operation that saved your life. If the amount of labour used determines value, then the chair is worth more than your life. Obvious nonsense' [Berkman, 1987, 19]. The surgeon's training might, also, be no longer than an artisan's apprenticeship. Furthermore, it is hard to determine where and when labour starts for certain professions, such as for acting, writing or child-minding.

Freedom under Kropotkin's editorship pursued a clear anarchist-communist line. It considered mutualism and Bakuninist collectivism to be little better than capitalism. Mutualists aim:

[T]o secure every individual neither more nor less than the exact amount of wealth resulting from the exercise of his own capacities. Are not the scandalous inequalities in the distribution of wealth today merely the culminative effect of the principle that every man is justified in securing to himself everything that his chances and capacities enable him to lay his hands on [Freedom, April 1888, Vol. 2 No. 19, 75].

Individualist-anarchism, which has similarities with, but is not identical to, anarcho-capitalism, was condemned on the same grounds. Anarchist-communism became throughout the end of the 19th Century the dominant current in British libertarianism.

Even in the period prior to the First World War, the separation between workplace and community organisation, which was regarded as the distinction between anarcho-syndicalism and anarchist-communism, was often more tactical than universal. Anarchist-communists were active in industrial organisation as well as supporting propaganda by deed. Kropotkin himself defended certain of these spectacular acts and also wrote of the need for revolutionary syndicates [Marshall, 1992, 438 & Kropotkin, 1997e, 26]. Propaganda was carried out on two fronts; industrial activism and community organisation. As a result of working on these different fronts, links were built across anarchist groups and into the wider socialist and labour movements.

Propaganda by word, through meetings, rallies, papers and pamphlets, was not a pacifist alternative to other forms of action. Liberal commentators are often embarrassed by Kropotkin's advocacy of both industrial methods and propaganda by deed, as well as respectable propaganda by word [Joll, 1964, 128 & Woodcock, 1992, ix]. These were not, however, mutually exclusive currents, but complimentary measures. Each was used independently or in combination, depending on circumstances, to develop and encourage emancipation for the oppressed classes from repressive situations. By 1914 the anarchist movement was still marginal in terms of its numbers, but anarchist ideas on tactics and objectives had grown into a minority current in many industries and had permeated into various large communities. However, at this point the movement went into rapid decline. The reasons for this are not hard to discern.

4. Anarchism During the First World War, 1914 - 1918

With the outbreak of war, anarchism's advocacy of anti-militarism and internationalism was out of keeping with the new jingoistic mood in Britain. The excitement of the innovative forms of battle seemed far more enticing than the outmoded idea of universal fellowship. The start of international conflict also meant that prominent refugee organisers were interned as enemy aliens. For Rocker, this included being held on a prison ship moored off the south coast [Rocker, 1956]. He was not released until 1918 and then only into Holland. He remained an active anarchist however, setting up the anarcho-syndicalist International Workers' Association in 1922, but he never returned to Britain.

The war not only lost potential recruits to the anarchist cause through conscription but, as Meltzer suggests, it also provided a cover for the British state to use political foul play against its opponents. Evidence to support this allegation includes the significant number of disappearances of radicals during the period of the First World War [Meltzer, 1992, 23]. As a result the talk held on the 5th of February, 1915 by Der Arbeter Fraint entitled, 'The Present Crisis' could be seen as a commentary on the movement as much as the European situation.

Those socialists who had remained loyal to their internationalist ideals during the feverish jingoism of the early war years had forged a strong bond of unity. 'Everywhere the Socialists were aggressive and everywhere they moved in solidarity. No attention was paid to party barriers' [Aldred, 1943, 83].¹⁴ As the conflict continued and the casualties mounted in horrifying numbers, nationalistic fervour began to diminish. As a result, the revolutionary anti-war movement, of which anarchism had been a part (Kropotkin's support for the allies being a rare exception), began to regain public support.

They received a further short term fillip with the successful Russian Revolutions of 1917 (February and October), although the latter was shortly to have a devastating effect on the global anarchist movement.

A consequence of working closely with the marxists was that a mutual appreciation of each other's theories developed. Anarchists adopted Marx's analysis of class society, while socialists began to oppose social democratic tactics [Organise!, 42, Spring 1996, 13]. The Bolshevik Revolution was initially greeted favourably by the anarchists. Only a few immigrant-community anarchist groups in America condemned the Leninist insurrection from the beginning. Nearly all the others, including the normally sceptical, and by then veteran anarchist, Emma Goldman, greeted it with delight. Freedom, although suspicious of the Bolsheviks, sang the praises of the revolution in 1918 as it 'has been compelled by events to adopt many ideas put forward by anarchists', a view endorsed in Guy Aldred's anti-parliamentary communist paper The Spur [Freedom, October 1918, 55 & Narodnik, 1918, 165]. Slowly, however, the Bolshevik Revolution began to sap the anarchist movement of its strength, through the domination of the revolutionary movements by the Leninists [Aldred, 1943, 82].

The events October 1917 were regarded as the decisive theoretical and tactical breakthrough and many left, or were dissuaded from anarchist groups, in favour of Communist Parties. Other sympathizers were lost when Jewish male Russian immigrants (who had provided the core support to the anarchist movement, especially to Der Arbeter Fraint), returned to the motherland after the revolution. They now seized the opportunity to go home and build a socialist utopia [Meltzer, 1996, 48]. Other sections of the original immigrant community, as it became anglicised, found that the Yiddish speaking anarchist movement no longer held as great an attraction. By the end of the war the influence of the anarchist movement had sharply declined.

5. The Decline of Anarchism and the Rise of the Leninist Paradigm: 1918 - 1936

Disputes on aims and tactics between anarchists and marxists precede the battle between Bakunin and Marx in the first International. However, by-and-large, anarchists and Marxists of the turn of the century had the same vision of a utopian society. It was of free labour, in which people had the opportunity to undertake the types of activity they wished to carry out, the type of society described by Marx in The German Ideology:

[I]n a communist society, where nobody has one exclusive sphere of activity but each can become accomplished in any branch he wishes, society regulates the general production and thus makes it possible for me to do one thing today and another tomorrow, to hunt in the morning, fish in the afternoon, rear cattle in the evening, criticise after dinner, just as I have a mind, without ever becoming hunter, fisherman, cowherd or critic [Marx, 1967, 110-1].

The difference at first was seen as tactical, as Lenin in The State and Revolution suggests. Both anarchists and Leninists claimed that they wanted the abolition of the state, but anarchists desired its immediate eradication. They claimed that it was impossible to use the state in a libertarian manner, whereas Lenin, following Frederic Engels, wanted to make temporary use of it (which he idiosyncratically defines as the exercise of 'organised violence') for communist ends [Lenin, 1976, 73]. The victory of the Bolshevik forces gave Lenin incredible power within revolutionary circles. He used his success as validation of his methods, his biting invective and Russia's financial reserve (the infamous 'Moscow Gold') to encourage other revolutionaries to follow suit [Lenin, 1975, 6 & Kendall, 1969, 249]. Revolutionary socialist groups were amassed into a Second International with Lenin's strategic plan providing the political blueprint. Those groupings that remained outside were harshly criticised by Lenin, as his political formula required only one Communist Party for each country. In Quail's words, since this single grouping, in Lenin's terms, 'represented the only path to revolution, all other groups were not just wrong but counter-revolutionary' [Quail, 1978, 287]. On January 1921, under the direction of Lenin, the Communist Party of Great Britain was formed out of three formerly separate communist parties [Aldred, 1943, 82]. The aim was to dominate and control the British revolutionary movement.

As we have seen, in its early years anarchism had developed as part of a broad socialist movement and as such, suffered equally with the revival of patriotism at the outbreak of the First World War. In the immediate post-war period, anarchism received a boost as opposition to the war had enabled associations to be built which cut across party divisions. The Bolshevik Revolution did little to increase solidarity however. Under Lenin's direction, organisational diversity was deplored and structural differences between anarchists and orthodox marxists were strengthened.

The Russian Revolution encouraged large numbers of radicals to follow the Bolshevik path, but while many anarchists were won over to Bolshevism, a few socialists rejected Lenin's centralism. Groups such as the Communist League, formed in 1919 and dying in the same year, brought together anarchists from Freedom, Guy Aldred's The Spur and anti-parliamentarians from the Socialist Labour Party (SLP) (a group which had links to the American IWW). They aimed to compete with statist communism, which was gaining ground in the revolutionary movement. Reports of growing authoritarianism within the Leninist regime became an increasingly common feature in anarchist papers from 1922 onwards [Walter in Berkman, 1989, xi]. The Kronstadt rebellion, carried out by workers and strikers wanting a return to the principles of the revolution, and supported by anarchists and left-wing revolutionaries, was crushed by the armed forces under the control of Leon Trotsky and Grigorii Zinoviev [Berkman, 1989, 297-303].¹⁵ There was additional suppression of anarchists with the imprisoning of activists in Moscow [Aldred, 1943, 7]. From the early 1920s onwards the Soviet union was recognised in anarchist circles as being just another form of dictatorship, and they identified Leninism with counterrevolution.

The Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB and sometimes CP),¹⁶ formed in 1921, not only competed with independent, libertarian movements, it actively intervened to prevent working class activity that was not under its control. The early 1920s unemployed workers movement was sabotaged by the CPGB who wanted the National Unemployed Workers Movement to be run by their appointees [Ken Weller, Flux, Issue 5, Autumn 1992, 10]. The apparent success of centralised party organisation and the subsequent closure of opportunity for autonomous activities caused anarchist self-confidence to collapse and by 1924 the movement was 'in deep depression and disarray' [Quail, 1978, 305]. By the time of the General Strike of 1926 anarchists had next to no influence, except in an individual capacity.

In a survey carried out by Espero White for a mooted Federation of Groups in 1933, there were about 500 anarchist militants, people who were members of groups or regular subscribers to anarchist papers, in the whole country. Even at this low ebb, however, there were still a far larger number who sympathized with anarchism [Meltzer, 1976, 8]. Nevertheless, the reduction in anarchist ranks was such that by the time Goldman came over to visit old comrades in London in 1935, most had moved into the CPGB or the Labour Party [Meltzer, 1976, 8]. Others, like Tom Keell, Freedom's editor after the departure of Kropotkin, had retired to the Whiteway Colony, an anarchist commune in the Cotswolds [Meltzer, 1976, 9].

6. Decay of Working Class Organisations: The Spanish Civil War to the Hungarian Revolution, 1936 - 1956

In the early 1930s the occasional anarchist paper was still being produced, but it seemed to be more of a monument than a movement. Papers like Freedom Bulletin, produced by Keell from the Whiteway's colony, were filled with obituaries and reminiscences rather than practical calls to action. It was the Spanish Civil War that gave anarchism a boost, not simply through providing a cause to rally around, but through the arrival of foreign anarchists to Britain, providing a core of activists to revitalise a largely moribund British scene.

The anti-fascist movement in Britain was dominated by the CPGB. The left-intellectual milieu was dominated by pro-Soviet Union sentiment, to the extent that all active opposition to Franco was credited to the Communists. The Communists accused the CNT-FAI (Confederacion Nacional Del Trabajo - Federacion Anarquista Iberica) and the non-aligned marxist POUM (Partido Obrero de Unificacion Marxista) of being 'fascist agents' [Richards, 1989, 3]. The anarchists, already sensitised to the perils of state-communism by the experience of Russia, saw that the situation in Spain represented a dangerous opportunity for further extension of Stalinist domination of working class movements. Spain provided an occasion for anarchism to break away from the shadow of other forms of socialism.

Following the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War British anarchists took an increasingly syndicalist stance influenced by the CNT-FAI who opened a London Bureau [Meltzer, 1976a, 14]. An anarcho-Syndicalist Union (ASU) was formed, as well as the already existing Syndicalist Propaganda League. The ASU's work was mostly dedicated to rallying support for the anarchists in Spain, although it was involved in one minor industrial dispute on the home-front [Meltzer, 1976a 15-18]. Vernon Richards (Vero Recchioni) and Marie-Louise Beneri, both children of Italian anarchists produced the paper Spain and the World around which support for the Spanish anarchists was co-ordinated. The Freedom Group closed their newspaper in order to put their energy into the new Spain and the World as did the Anarchist Communist Federation, run by Aldred in Scotland, with its paper Solidarity [Meltzer, 1996, 54]. The remnants of Freedom reorganised themselves as distributors of anarchist literature [Meltzer, 1976a, 15-16].

With the fate of British anarchist groups tied to those of their comrades in Spain, the fracturing of loyalist forces resulted in a reorganisation in Britain. The split in Spanish anarchist ranks concerning the rightness of supporting a government, was repeated in Britain. Most took the view of Buenaventura Durruti, who opposed the compromise and participation in the Popular Front, as did Marie-Louise Berneri's father, Camillo, who was killed by Stalinists in the 'tragic week of May' when Communist forces turned on the left wing opposition [Meltzer, 1976a, 15]. 1939 saw the end of the Spanish campaign. This decline in activity led in the same year to an attempt to create an Anarchist Federation of Britain (AFB) (a similar enterprise earlier in the thirties had come to nothing) [Meltzer, 1976a, 19]. The AFB admitted a wide selection of support, from those interested in civil liberty (Emma Goldmanites), anarcho-syndicalists (ASU), councilists (Committee for Workers' Control), anti-parliamentary communists (Anarchist Federation of Glasgow), anti-fascists and trade-union anarchists and, various small parties from the various Freedom Groups [Meltzer, 1976a, 18]. Before long the Federation felt the strain of internal feuding. It broke back into its various individual constituents, the Freedom Press Group of Richards, Berneri and Philip Samson being one section.

The growing hysteria surrounding the international military situation with Germany also further demoralised the anarchist movement, as it had done in the First World War, although there were much fewer cases of internment of anarchists this time around [Meltzer, 1976a, 19-20]. With the outbreak of hostilities, Spain and the World was replaced by War Commentary, again edited by Richards and Berneri, but with the addition of Meltzer and Tom Brown. War Commentary and the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation's (APCF) Solidarity opposed the war, not on pacifist grounds, but because the conflict served the interests of the ruling class. They both somewhat unrealistically argued for global working class action to overthrow the bodies which had brought about the conflict [Libertarian in Richards, 1989, 21].

Those producing War Commentary became increasingly involved in the circulation of anti-militarist material. With victory over Nazi Germany growing increasingly assured, the paper was growing in popularity amongst those in the armed forces (including Colin Ward and later Jazz performer George Melly). As a result, the authorities instituted raids on the press, and four of the editors of War Commentary were charged with 'conspiracy to seduce His Majesty's Forces' [Meltzer, 1976a, 29]. Three of them, Richards, Philip Samson and John Hewetson, were imprisoned just as the war in Europe was concluded. The case solidified the support of a number of intellectuals who were linked to the movement. These included Alex Comfort,¹⁷ the painter Augustus John and art critic Herbert Read. After the final cessation of the conflict in August 1945 War Commentary changed its name to Freedom.

The War, as before, polarised opinion. Communism and Liberal Democracy were on one side and Fascism and the axis dictatorships on the other, with little room for alternatives. This division led to examples of unfortunate, contradictory and downright unprincipled coalitions. Aldred, having left the APCF prior to the conflict, aligned his anti-war paper The Word with the pro-Nazi Duke of Bedford. Elsewhere, due to the anarchist's opposition to fighting the war, libertarianism began to develop a pacifist following such as in the North East London Anarchist Group [Meltzer, 1976a, 24 & 33]. Similarly the Spanish anarchists, in the isolation of exile and the despondency of defeat, made dishonourable alliances. The CNT in exile supported the allies during the Second World War, and hoped that after defeating Hitler they would go on to liberate Spain from the nominally neutral Franco [Meltzer, 1976b, 5]. As a result of these compromises on fundamental principles, the British libertarian movement had, by the end of 1945, two different groups calling themselves anarchists: '[T]he dead wood of social-democratic pseudo-libertarianism still parading the theory of the 'just' war (as exemplified by the National committee of the CNT in Toulouse) [...] and on the other hand [...] the liberal-pacifist cult' [Meltzer, 1976b, 5]. Anarchism took on, in most areas, either a pacifist or social-democratic demeanour. This was incompatible with the revolutionary character of the original British movement and with the necessarily violent Spanish groups of the civil war period.

The changing character of British anarchism from a working class based revolutionary movement to a more liberal-pacifist, intellectual and artistic centred avant-garde was exemplified when the Anarchist Federation split in 1944. According to Marshall, the break came because the syndicalists had gained prominent positions in the AFB [Marshall, 1992, 492]. Meltzer, however, felt that an ideological explanation was superimposed after the event, as the split was more a personality difference [Meltzer, 1976a, 28]. The remaining syndicalist rump of the AFB retitled themselves the Syndicalist Workers Federation (SWF) in 1954, later becoming Direct Action (DA) and latterly the Solidarity Federation (SolFed).

The anarchist movement's drift away from revolution to peaceful, liberal co-existence fitted into the post-war mood of the times. The elation following the victory over fascism, and the Labour landslide of 1945, with the implementation of the Beveridge

Report by Atlee's Government, won over a huge swathe of the British public to parliamentary reform. This model of political activism became the paradigm just as the Bolshevik revolution had been the standard for socialism nearly three decades earlier.

After the war the League for Workers' Control and the 1953 Anarcho-Syndicalist Committee continued with a syndicalist strategy but they made little impact. The consensual approach to politics in Britain and the post-war economic boom had curtailed radical revolt. The disaffected gravitated towards the CPGB, which, after the war, was still looked upon benignly by large sections of the British public. This political and social restraint was broken by three important events of the mid 1950s: The Suez Crisis, the Birth of the anti-bomb movement and the Hungarian Uprising [Ward, 1987, 8].

7. Spring and Fall of the New Left: 1956 - 1976

On February 25th 1956, Nikita Krushchev, in a speech at the XXth Conference of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, admitted to the abuses and tyranny of Stalin's rule. If it was meant to be a sign of a thaw in the cold war then the invasion of Hungary by Soviet forces in November the same year indicated that Russian rule was far from softening. Those within the CP had been able to dismiss reports of Soviet oppression as being merely the propaganda of the bourgeois press, until their admission by the highest official within the USSR. Krushchev's confession and the subsequent suppression of the Hungarian working class by Russian tanks in Budapest resulted in the disillusionment of many socialists with Stalinism [Weller, 1992, 9].¹⁸ In the two years between 1956 and 1958 the CP lost 10,000 members - a 30 per cent reduction in its membership [Fountain, 1988, 2].

Many of these former Communists remained Leninist in principle and supported pre-existing Trotskyist and marxist groupings such as the Revolutionary Socialist League (RSL) and the Socialist Labour League (SLL).¹⁹ However, the libertarian socialist Solidarity²⁰ group was formed out of disillusioned CP members thrown out of the SLL. Solidarity had a small part to play in the British anarchist revival in the 1960s and 70s, and members of this group continued to participate in British anarchism in the 1990s.

7.1. Changing Constituency

The decline in Britain's world standing was made apparent with the Suez Crisis, also in 1956. Britain's ruling elite attempted to maintain their nation's status as an imperial power by resorting to military action, which, under pressure from America was quickly aborted. The decision to use force, and the availability of weapons capable of killing on a global scale, led to the rise of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND), which was given added impetus by the Cuban missile crisis in 1962. This pressure group provided a further source of potential recruits for the developing political New Left as well as for the counterculture. In a postal survey of CND members and Young CND members carried out in 1965-1966, 7% of the former and 10% of the latter described themselves as anarchists. The overwhelming majority became anarchists after joining CND [Parkin, 1968, 105]. However, the types of people who were attracted to CND came predominantly from the middle classes [Parkin, 1968, 17]. They were not from the sections of society to which anarchism had traditionally sought to appeal.

²⁰ This has no connection to a right wing grouping in the Labour Party which had the same name.

Nevertheless, this new interest group did afford 'a pool in which to swim. The [anarchist] ideas were able to be heard for the first time by a larger audience' [Meltzer, 1976b, 13]. CND, and their direct action spin off Committee of 100, provided a meeting point for young people interested in wider political and social questions [Hewison, 1986, 15 & Christie, 1980, 25].

These new converts encouraged the reformation of the Anarchist Federation of Britain (AFB) in 1963. Its anarchist principles were, however, unclear and confused, as the ACF explain:

[T]he revolutionary core of Anarchism, already deeply affected by the erroneous ideas of the Synthesis as devised by Voline and [Sebastien] Faure (which sought a fusion between individualism, syndicalism and libertarian communism within the same organisation) was further diluted in Britain [Organise! No. 42, Spring 1996, 15].

The plural approach attracted pacifists, extreme-liberals and individualists as well as more traditional anarchist-communists and anarcho-syndicalists. The aims of the different sections were not just diverse they were often contradictory. As a result the reformed AFB had no clear tactical or organisational strategy. Annoyed with the appearance of liberals within anarchism, Stuart Christie (Scottish anarcho-syndicalist and co-founder of the ABC) sought out contacts with the more militant European libertarian movement. Arrested in Spain, with Ferrado Carballo, for carrying explosives, he was charged by the Francoist authorities with attempting to assassinate the fascist dictator [Meltzer, 1976b, 64].²¹

²¹ Christie was given a twenty year sentence

Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, the post-war political consensus began to unravel. There were a number of causes. The increased birth rates in the years after the Second World War meant that by the time this cohort reached maturity they were a demographic challenge to the depleted ranks of the older generation. The general improvement in prosperity made their parents' mores, based on rationing and fear of shortage, seem anachronistic in the new, affluent 'pop' society. Furthermore, despite the general increase in prosperity, longstanding social problems, such as housing shortages, had not been resolved.

Discontent grew against the paternalistic state. Left-wing intellectuals complained that bureaucracy at local and national levels, in the form of punitive planning, censorship and public order legislation, was restricting individual freedoms and artistic imagination [Banham, Barker, Hall & Price, 1969]. The welfare state, for all its advantages, was regarded as acting on, or for, individuals, but was not actually under their control. Additionally, the growing economy required an expansion in higher education to train new sections of the community for the managerial positions that had been created. Increased strain on university resources, alongside the problems caused by an obstructive state, led to the phenomenon of student radicalism, which had its origins in the American civil rights campaigns in the South, and grew into the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). The rebellion of the predominantly educated, white young, was given further impetus by the bloody conflict in Southeast Asia.

This new, younger, more academic readership that the Freedom Press Group had attracted was successfully targeted from 1961 onwards with a new magazine, Anarchy. Its circulation grew to 4,500, while its readership was many times that amount [Ward, 1987, 8]. Colin Ward edited its first 100 issues. During Ward's editorship, Anarchy took anarchist ideas and applied them to aspects of society not covered by previous libertarian publications. It was regarded by some of the class struggle anarchists to represent 'Revisionist Anarchism little different from Liberalism' [Meltzer, 1976a, 32] because it prioritised protest rather than revolution. Nevertheless, even in this diluted form it did introduce various features of anarchism to a wider, previously uninformed readership. British libertarianism prospered with this influx of new blood, but not all were happy. The anarchist movement at the time was 'side-tracked by the new left, anti-bomb, militant-liberal-conscience element away from being a revolutionary working class movement. This was not anarchism as I understood it' [Christie, 1980, 31]. However some of the new anarchists disparaged by more traditional members later adopted revolutionary positions [Christie, 1980, 8].

The British anarchist movement strayed further away from its traditional working class roots - a trend apparent in the 1940s but more evident in the 1960s. A 1962 survey of Freedom readers found that:

[O]nly 15 per cent of them [...] belonged to the traditional groupings of workers and peasants; of the 85 per cent of 'white-collar' workers the largest group consisted of teachers and students, and there were also many architects and doctors, as well as people employed in the arts, sciences and journalism. Even more significant was the class shift among the young. 45 per cent of the readers over 60 were manual workers, as against 23 per cent of those in their thirties and 10 per cent of those in their twenties [Woodcock, 1975, 462].

The fall in proletarian composition within anarchism partly reflected the changing class composition of the wider society from manual work to clerical and administrative employment. The trend throughout the 1960s within most popular libertarian movements was to move further away from its traditional sources of support in the conventional working class, towards the new social movements. The change in the nature of support in anarchist groups had a reciprocal affect on the categories of people and tactic deemed suitable to bring about emancipatory change.

7.2. Alternative Revolutionary Subjects

The civil rights and anti-war movements in America and the growing student protests in Europe throughout the 1960s saw a combination of liberal causes being reassessed using collectivist analytical tools. There was renewed interest in libertarianism and the other minor revolutionary traditions [Meltzer, 1976b, 8]. The non-Bolshevik revolutionary socialist trends that Leninism had first ridiculed and marginalised, and which Stalinism then liquidated from the socialist canon, were being rediscovered. Student activists in France, such as Daniel Cohn-Bendit ('Danny the Red') with his brother Gabriel in their book Obsolete Communism the Left-Wing Alternative²² cited the anti-Bolshevik revolutionaries of Nestor Makhno [220-232], the Kronstadt rebels [234-245], anarcho-syndicalism especially the Durruti Column [218], and the council-communists [244]. These examples of autonomous workers' struggles were also discussed and promoted by the Situationists, most famously Michele Bernstein, Guy Debord, Mustapha Khayati and

Raoul Vaneigem.²³

There was what Alfred Willener calls a 'double juncture' between '[m]arxism/anarchism, politics/culture' [Willener, 1970, 3]. With the rejection of Stalinism, the ideological restraints had been broken, so that marxism was released from being a specific set of dogmas and rediscovered as an interpretative device and tactical tool. The combination of anarchism and marxism was not new as Christie & Meltzer explain. Class-struggle anarchists such as anarcho-syndicalists had disagreed with marxist prescriptions not its economic analysis of social problems [Christie & Meltzer, 1984, 41]. It was the extension of this analysis into aspects of modern life, which Marx could barely have imagined, which provided one of the original stimuli to the 1960s rebellion [Lefebvre, 1988, 77].

Debates and arguments between the various political groups still existed. Nonetheless there was a unity constructed through co-operation between participants that was similar to that in the previous growth period for libertarianism (the classical age up to 1914). Politics in France was being extended into the wider culture - art, theatre and poetry [Willener, 1970, 201]. So too in Britain, 'the underground' saw radical politics expand beyond the small, special interest groups or quadrennial visits to a polling booth into becoming part of the fabric of the everyday. The new politics entered into cultural life because the oppressive power it sought to negate was not merely generated by, and operated in, the economic and political arenas, between employers and employee, governors and governed. It intruded into a host of institutions and practices beyond the spheres of production and political representation. Even the trade unions and the orthodox left, originally set up to protect the interests of the oppressed, were acknowledged to be part of the repressive institutional framework which integrated revolt into the existing system. Capitalist methods of production and exchange modified, glamorised, and yet rendered all social interchange banal, causing atomisation of the public realm. Individuals became capable only of interacting through the hierarchical power structures of consumption. They sought compensation through commodities, yet such a solution only worsened the sense of dislocation [Knabb, 1989, 323].²⁴

In this respect the 1960s radicals were returning to some of the concerns that anarchism had stressed in its classical period. Libertarianism had always regarded oppression in much wider terms than merely the economic and political. Rocker lectured on literature, Kropotkin and Goldman wrote and pamphleteered on the affects of prisons on the prisoner, on the wider community and as a representation of a particular ideology in operation [Kropotkin, 1970]. The range of oppressive practices was wider than just factory and wage conditions and consequently the area of resistance and potential radical subjects were broader than the categories of industrial proletariat at the point of production.

The British anarchists were influenced by the activities taking place throughout the rest of the world. 1968 was a touchstone for revolutionaries. The potential for students and workers to combine in autonomous struggle for a total re-shaping of reality under egalitarian, participatory organisation, had an intense influence on the left, both libertarian and authoritarian (1.3.).

Nostalgia for the lost possibilities of this time can be traced even in writers barely old enough to have been born in 1968.²⁵ The Paris uprising was regarded as a model for libertarian possibilities. Even at the time British groups were inspired by the events across the Channel. Solidarity, already with links to France's Socialisme ou Barbarie, sent a couple of members to Paris in May 1968 and they returned highly impressed by the autonomous student-worker activities. The Solidarity members were particularly encouraged by the efforts of both groups to resist the machinations of the French Communist Party and its trade unions, into reinterpreting the rebellion against the state into the traditional framework of wage-demands [Solidarity, 1986]. Similarly the prefigurative politics of the SDS made a great impact, as did the highly publicised pranks of the American hippie-radicals, the Yippies.

With the strength of the student movement, and the stress in the popular press reports of May '68 on the acts of the young rather than trade unionists, a new revolutionary agent was thought to be developing.²⁶ Some forms of anarchism did appear to go along with this and reject the working class as the revolutionary agent. The events in Vietnam and Central America produced interest in the peasantry in countries under colonial rule. Previously repressed issues and concerns became prominent: The Women's movements, Gay (and later - Lesbian) liberation, environmental crises, Irish Catholics, Black and Asian immigrant communities, and the mentally ill. While some have maintained that these forms of oppression could be assimilated into more orthodox economic analyses, others regarded the oppositions of black versus white or equality versus patriarchy as a replacement to class antagonisms.²⁷ The women's movement, in particular, with its questioning of hierarchy and experiments in egalitarian organisation was a particularly potent influence on British anarchism.

The women's movements introduced new critiques of organisational practices that had dominated the revolutionary movements. Feminists challenged assumptions concerning the agent and location of revolt. The presumption had been that the central agent of change was the male, industrial worker located at the point of production in heavy manufacturing. Women's groups re-conceptualised social problems. Feminists focused on exploitation and hierarchy in other aspects of social life such as education, the home and culture rather than solely in the traditional workplace. In doing so they introduced a lexicon that differed from solely class-based critiques.

²⁷ See for instance Solanas, 1991 (available in 1968) and Malcolm X and Alex Haley's Autobiography of Malcolm X

Feminists re-appraised the organisational structures of self-proclaimed radical groupings and found that they often imitated the sexual divisions of labour and hierarchical structures of the detested hegemonic organisations. In 'alternative' newspapers women's views were denigrated and patronised, their female members were allocated specifically secretarial tasks rather than more highly esteemed journalistic ones [Fountain, 1988, 101-6]. As Peggy Kornegger laments 'Anarchist men have been little better than males elsewhere in their subjection of women' [Kornegger, 1996, 159].

In response to the sexism of the revolutionary movements, new practices and women-centred groups developed to counter them. The democratic structures of radical organisation were examined and modified [Freeman, 1984 & Levine, 1984]. Tactics included supporting and building women's only groups, Rape Crisis Centres and refuges and also projects which renewed interest in woman's roles in the work-place and the home [Dalla Costa & James, 1975]. These became features not only of distinctive anarcha-feminist movements, but began to filter through into the general anarchist milieu [Kornegger, 1996, 162]. Sexist behaviours still exist within more general anarchist movements²⁸ and are consequently the subject of continued censure and mockery from anarcha-feminists.²⁹

²⁹ See for instance 'The struggle against sexism in the left-wing movement is a women's issue and they [leftist men] don't want to be involved' [Bad Attitude No. 5, Oct/Nov 1993, 24]. See too Class Whore, (woman

Feminism extended the economic category of the working class beyond the European, white, male stereotype and (re-)introduced other perspectives. With the growth in interest of ecological concerns, new repressive conditions and sites of conflict were identified. Bookchin is credited with having re-integrated the question of humanity's relationship to the natural environment, which had been a feature of Kropotkin's anarchist-communism, back into libertarianism and the wider protest movement. Environmentalism, with the publication of Rachel Carson's Silent Spring on the effect of pesticides, and Bookchin's Our Synthetic Environment, were texts which reflected growing public concern with the ecological damage wrought by the industrial post-war boom. Many of those in the environmental movement questioned the revolutionary agency of the working class, and many indeed were rejecting revolution as both aim and means. As the green anarchist author PNR indicates it was Schumacher's Buddhist principles which interlaid his Small is Beautiful thesis which inspired people to 'drop-out' and form communes attempting self-sufficient existence [PNR, 1992, 2].

7.3. Tactical Responses

The end of 1968 saw a growing counterculture, which was attractive to the young who had different values from the older generations. One method of meeting their desires was the creation of communes in which young people experimented with new types of domestic arrangements. These experiments in collective living can be divided into two groups: those which saw the communes as a basis for more radical activities which confronted heteronomous power and those which ignored existing power structures but attempted to create liberated zones within them.³⁰ Some communes used the cheap space and supportive atmosphere to create new products as well as providing markets for goods on the fringes of the economy; drugs, music and media which reflected their lifestyles. There was a huge growth in radical newspapers and magazines, Black Dwarf, Frendz, Ink, International Times, Red Mole, Oz and the opening of radical bookshops in which they could be bought and sold. Thus, radical left-wing causes were mixed with liberalizing values and developing popular tastes.

Creating and satisfying fringe markets was seen as a method of fashioning more egalitarian social relations. The original draft of the founding document of the SDS - the Port Huron Statement - included a remark about how free-market relations could be potentially emancipatory. '[P]rivate enterprise is not inherently immoral or undemocratic indeed it may at times contribute to offset elitist tendencies' [Miller, 1987, 122]. In this period in the late 1960s and into the 1970s, the distinctions between the New Left and the New Right had yet to be formed.

In the 1960s, the New Right as an identifiable set of institutions, ideas and theorists had yet to coalesce into an identifiable camp. Prior to the New Right's consolidation of power, assisted by the election of Margaret Thatcher to the leadership of the Conservative Party in 1975, the underground contained many concepts and the some of the people which were to become associated with the Thatcher era. There was correspondence between New Right and New Left in their enemies: trade unions and their leaders, the state and the bureaucrats. The language of the New Left and soon to be New Right were also similar; both rejected 'paternalism' and 'welfarism', both wanted 'choice' and 'freedom', even if these terms were interpreted in diametrically opposed ways. Because the lines of demarcation between different ideologies and groups were unclear, orthodox Marxists, radical liberals, free-market libertarians and anti-market communists, found themselves acting in the same loose milieu: the Non-Plan published in the left-liberal New Society written by such protest culture luminaries as Cedric Price³¹ and Reynor Banham, was accepted as part of the left although its aim was for the creation of free-market solutions to architecture and planning problems.³²

Some left-libertarian countercultural activities were a challenge to market relations and embodied the participatory, prefigurative features of egalitarian anarchism. The communes formed by the squatting movement, which began in Redbridge on the London/Essex border in the winter of 1968-9, was a reaction to the continuing housing shortage. The accommodation crisis was brought again into the public mind by the repeated showing of the television drama Cathy Come Home. Squatting sought to create a remedy for the situation, by assisting hostel residents into vacant council houses and luxury apartments. It directly confronted the principle of private property and brought squatters into conflict with the state, at both local and national levels. As Chris Broad, one of the 1969

Anarchist, June 1991, No. 28, 18.

³¹ Price worked with the Communist theatre impresario Joan Littlewood on the design for a Fun Palace for London, and with Alexander Trocchi on plans for a situationist university.

Redbridge squatters, pointed out nearly a decade later, squatting was part of a wider revolutionary programme [Broad, Anarchy No. 26, 1978].

On the other side of London, in Notting Hill, the situationist-inspired King Mob, which included Malcolm McLaren amongst its ranks [Bear, 1988, 8], celebrated anti-social criminality and carried out pranks showing up the oppression behind the spectacle of capitalism. This involved employing the SI tactic 'detournement'; altering the symbols of the dominant order to illustrate how they influenced and controlled desire. It was, according to the Situationists, more than just inverting an image. It involved the twisting around of the everyday image or event, such that the oppressive ends and the mechanisms by which it operated were illuminated [Debord & Wolman, 1989, 8-14].

One of the situations created by the Mob involved one of their number dressing up as Father Christmas and entering Selfridges where he started to hand out free presents from the shop's stock to children. The security staff were called, who had to grab the presents back off the disappointed infants who then witnessed the arrest of Santa [Vague, 1997, 131]. King Mob did not survive long, and many, 'once their youthful hi-jinks were played out... [were] becoming part of the post '68 new middle classes' [Vague, 1997, 8].

The changing class composition of anarchist movements, with a concomitant change in the identification of the revolutionary agent, led some former anarchists into Leninist groups such as the International Socialists (IS), later to become the Socialist Workers Party (SWP). Christie himself, dissatisfied with British anarchism's slump into liberalism, had sought out contacts with European anarchist movements, in particular the Spanish anarchists, who remained linked to working class activism.

On his return to Britain, after his prison sentence in Spain, Christie along with Meltzer ran a class-struggle anarchist magazine, Black Flag - originally the magazine of the Anarchist Black Cross (ABC).³³ It supported the smaller anarcho-syndicalist sections in Britain and also formed links with terrorist groups such as the Red Army Faction (RAF) which grew out of the European New Left after the decline of the student unrest. These groups were supported because they still promoted the working class as the revolutionary agent, but designated the terrorist group as the vanguard. Black Flag also sympathetically reported the activities of the Angry Brigade. Because of Christie's involvement in Black Flag at its coverage, and his previous activities in Spain, Christie was one of the 'Stoke Newington Eight' prosecuted on conspiracy and explosive charges related to Angry Brigade events. He was acquitted.

Despite liberal accounts attempting to disassociate the AB from anarchism [Marshall, 1992, 493 & 558], the milieu they moved around in was one imbued with anarchist ideas. The origins of some of the personnel accused of AB activities came from within a self-consciously anarchist background [see Vague, 1997, 29-30] and some alleged members accused of AB conspiracies are still part of the current British anarchist scene. The targets and modus operandi of the AB were informed by the ideals of the libertarian tradition, with a particularly strong tinge of situationist theory. The situationist tone of the Angry Brigade is captured in their communiqués with their attack on 'Spectacles'³⁴ and direct quotations from Vaneigem.³⁵ The anarchist prerequisite of egalitarian, unmediated action is also at the fore:

Our revolution is autonomous rank and file action - we create it OURSELVES. [...] Our strategy is clear: How can we smash the system? How can the people take Power?

We must ATTACK, we cannot delegate our desire to take the offensive, Sabotage is a reality [...] We are against any external structure, whether it's called [Robert] Carr [Conservative minister], [Tom] Jackson [trade union official], IS [International Socialists], CP or SLL [Socialist Labour League] is irrelevant - they're all one and the same [Communiqué 7, Weir, 1985, 30].

Unlike other terrorist groups, it sought only the destruction of property [Communique 5, Weir, 1985, 25].³⁶ It portrayed itself as having no formal membership and hence was not an elitist organisation. 'Without any Central Committee and no hierarchy to classify our members, we can only know strange faces as friends through their actions' [The Brigade is Angry, Weir, 1985, 37]. The idea was to encourage direct action by anonymous groups of individuals alongside other working class activity, rather than as a replacement for it.

Against the earlier propagandists by deed whose interventions were supposed to lead or replace working class actions, AB activities were to be just another tactical method alongside. 'Organised militant struggle and organised terrorism go side by side' [Communique 6, Weir, 1985, 26]. Convicted AB-member John Barker was involved in claimants unions and industrial-based radical publications such as Strike and the Daily Grind a supplement of International Times [Barker, 1999, 101-2].

The AB attacks on the property of the Ford Chairman William Batty and contractor for Birmingham's Bryant Homes Chris Bryant and the trade ministers' residences (Carr) were directly influenced by the industrial struggles of the day. But like the Situationists the AB also regarded oppression as existing beyond the confines of industrial production. The offices of the state (police computer centre at Tintangel House, Post Office Tower) and the entertainment and consumer spectacle (Miss World, Biba's Boutique) were also targeted.

The attacks were embarrassing for both the officials of the state and the security forces. To the conservative factions of the ruling class, the Angry Brigade were another symptom of the disease of permissiveness infecting Britain. The authorities reacted by placing large sections of the politicised counterculture under surveillance, and subjected them to raid and arrest.

7.4. Fall of the New left

The increased interest by the security forces was just one of the many changes in circumstance that lead to the fragmentation and decline of the New Left. From January 1971 until early spring, the homes of known political activists and members of the 'hippie' counterculture were raided and activists arrested. In July the editors of Oz were on trial for obscenity over the schoolkids edition that pictured a sexually active Rupert the Bear. The Oz defendants were originally sentenced from 9 to 15 months although these were reduced on appeal[Fountain, 1988, 145]. The Angry Brigade trial was due to start in the autumn of 1971 [Vague, 1997, 67]. After a long trial of the eight defendants - John Barker, Chris Bott, Stuart Christie, Hilary Creek, Jim Greenfield, Kate McLean, Anna Mendleson and Angela Weir, four were acquitted: the jury also asked for clemency for the other four [Barker, 1998, 103 & Vague, 1997, 113]. Although '[n]ot a single person was ever convicted for actually committing any of the twenty-seven bombings and shootings attributed to the three-year-long conspiracy' [Bunyan, 1983, 42] the four convicted were each sentenced to 10 years. Unlike the Lady Chatterley and Oz trials, the AB accused was defended neither by the great and the good from the liberal establishment, nor by the orthodox left [Fountain, 1988, 179-80]. With the harsh sentences for those convicted of AB activities and the general crackdown by the authorities on counter-cultural activities, the libertarian milieu began to suffer. The combination of politics and culture, marxism and anarchism which had seen the prefigurative radical movement grow was fragmenting.

Other wider, social influences also had an effect. The economic conditions altered when the sixties boom along with its optimism and willingness to take risks were replaced by the economic downturn of the 1970s. Advertising in the radical press diminished, causing the closure of magazines that had supported militant action. Those that tried to continue faced competition from established media, who had recognised the new market and was keen to supply goods to meet its new demands. With the rise of the women's movement, the sexual titillation which had provided a readership for magazines such as It was no longer tolerated. This market and others that the radical press had served was taken over by the mainstream popular press. Revolutionary deeds became subjected to market forces and were commodified. As the SI had recognised 'ideology tries to integrate even the most radical acts.' [Gray (edt), 1974, 16]

Apart from greater antagonism towards anarchist activities from the state and the press the 1960s also failed to garner any significant working class support. The AB had tried to avoid becoming a vanguard movement yet its 'militarisation of struggle' (to use Barker's phrase) nevertheless created a covert and secretive elite acting on behalf of the working classes. The AB were consequently associated with other terrorist groups operating at the time - the IRA, Red Army Faction which were not anarchist. The creation of a vanguard was not only antipathetic to anarchism's egalitarian and prefigurative ethic, but was a tacit admission that the potentially revolutionary agent for change (the working class/es) were not moving in an anarchic direction. Incendiary tactics met only with stronger sanction from the judiciary and wider public distaste [Barker, 1999, 103-5].

Large sections of the British working class were ignored, patronised or caricaturingly idealised by the political New Left. Few industrial workers had actively participated in the 60s political or cultural alternatives. Oz journalist David Widgery, a member of the IS, commented: 'Occasionally you'd meet shop stewards at conferences who were interested in the underground press [...] or got stoned, or were interested in radical music. That was always very fruitful. Otherwise there wasn't much apparent link between the workers' struggles and - this psychedelic flowering' [Q. Widgery, Fountain, 1988, 214]. Working class skinheads watching the anti-Vietnam War demonstration, held in Grosvenor Square, in March 1968 derided the demonstrators: 'Students, students, ha, ha ha' [Q.

Vague, 1997, 26].³⁷

Workers did engage in apparently autonomous action, but not of the sort advocated by radicals. In April 1968, after Ted Heath sacked Enoch Powell from the shadow cabinet for the inflammatory 'rivers of blood speech', 1,000 London dockers staged a seemingly spontaneous march in support of Powell. Reactionary groupings led by the evangelical Christian Festival of Light gained mass support and the National Front forced its way into public prominence. '[W]orkers [... were] no longer ashamed to shout Keep Britain White' [Widgery, 1989, 11]. These events sapped the confidence of the radicals, while they had 'toyed with revolution, and while the underground had played with toys, workers were on the move, and in the wrong direction' [Fountain, 1988, 61].

In 1970, Heath replaced Harold Wilson and the 'inch of difference', that pivotal space in which the counterculture had prospered, disappeared. Yet the Heath government reactivated traditional working class opposition. Trade unions became the centre for popular agitation against the Conservative government. Most of the radical left, including the anarchists, had despised the unions for a number of reasons. For the hippies, unions were organisations of the straight workforce, whereas for the radicals they represented the old 'Stalinist' left. Unions mediated between employer and employee in resolving industrial problems. Union leaders had a significant role in the corporatist state and hence were considered to have had closer interests with the officers of the state than with their own rank-and-file. Yet the unions, rather than integrating the working class into capitalism, were now leading the assault on the Conservatives through opposition to the Industrial Relations Act (1971). The radicals' confidence in their own analysis was severely dented, as was their credibility.

The result was that large sections of the libertarian milieu returned to more traditional forms of anarchist activity. The Organisation of Revolutionary Anarchists (ORA), a grouping within the AFB, and while critical of union bureaucrats did not dismiss trade union activity [Organise! No. 42, Spring 1996, 16-17]. In 1975, ORA changed its name to the Anarchist Workers Association [Organise! No. 42, Spring 1996, 17], reflecting its reaffirmation of the revolutionary role ascribed to the working class. The AWA paper reported the industrial struggles, was selling a respectable 1500-2000 copies an issue [Organise! No.42, Spring 1996, 17].

It was the successes as well as the failures that lead to the dissolution of the radical environment. The most significant victory for the radical left was the American withdrawal from Vietnam in 1975. Yet, this removed the main political cause, opposition to a war against a civilian peasant population, which had unified the radical movements. The hippie counterculture that had included the burst of libertarian experimentation was replaced with a more aggressive current.

8. Punk and DiY Culture: 1976 - 1984

The skinheads who had derided the predominantly academically-privileged anti-war protestors at Grosvenor Square (described above) were a source of inspiration for the King Mob. King Mob 'aspire[d] to be a "street gang with analysis"' [Vague, 1997, 130], an ambition seemingly adopted by later anarchist groups such as Class War. One of the Mob's members, Malcolm McLaren, a clothing entrepreneur, wanted to appeal to the street hooligans. Together with his then partner Vivienne Westwood, McLaren turned clothing into provocation and helped to enliven the moribund anarchist movements. McLaren also knew Jamie Reid a radical graphic designer, who, like other libertarians, had been involved in creating a militant, local periodical, Suburban Press. Suburban Press combined a prankish situationist approach with a specific local interest in the new London satellite towns. It was successful enough in its catchment area and claimed to sell 5,000 copies. It was active in promoting squatters' and claimants' groups. However, it was never sufficiently large to threaten the authorities - not even the local council who Reid maintained were corrupt [Reid & Savage, 1987, 35 & 45]. McLaren invited Reid up to London to assist him on his latest project, that of creating and promoting the Sex Pistols.

Reid was already becoming disenchanted with revolutionary politics as it was being practised. He saw it as id, formulaic and insular [Reid, 1987, 55]. Reid accepted McLaren's proposal as it 'seemed very much a perfect vehicle to communicate the ideas that had been formulated during that period [....] to people who weren't getting the message out of the left-wing politics at the time' [Reid, 1987, 55]. The Sex Pistols not only jolted one of Britain's largest economic sectors - the music industry, but drew a whole new section of the public into anarchism. The Pistols and many other punk bands set out deliberately to manipulate the mass media in order to provide free publicity for the band and provoke the established order. A few swear words during the Bill Grundy interview on television created a scandal in the mainstream newspapers and hence promotion for the group.³⁸ Playing up to and shocking the media into reporting activities was a trick which others, in particular Ian Bone of Class War, attempted to emulate, and in Bone's case with some success [Bone, 1997, 9 & Home, 1988, 95].

Stewart Home, a frequent critic of British anarchism, interprets punk by concentrating on McLaren's aim of using it as a commercial vehicle [Home, 1995, 19]. Certainly punk's aesthetic was used to promote a variety of ideologies including commercialism and the far-right (for instance nationalist punk like Chelsea and Screwdriver), but for many it represented working class identity and a rejection of consumerism in which passivity was denigrated [Home, 1995, 96].³⁹ The gender balance of the key actors in the movement, and the roles they were assigned, was altered by the active involvement of women such as Siouxsie-Sioux, Poly Styrene and The Slits [Marcus, 1989, 37-40],⁴⁰ a tradition which stretched into the 1990s with the Riot Grrrls.

There was a disdain for the commercialisation of protest. Contempt was aimed at the 60s counterculture that had become integrated into the existing systems of oppression. 'The hippies now wear Black. The system wears hippie' [Crass, 1982, ³⁸ The Sex Pistol's 'Anarchy in the UK' went to the top of the charts and the best selling single in the week of Queen Elizabeth II's Silver Jubilee was the Sex Pistol's 'God Save the Queen'. The lyrics of the Pistol's track differed from those of the National Anthem. 'God Save the Queen - and the fascist regime / It made you a moron - A potential H bomb / God save the Queen - she's not a human being / There is no future - In England's dream' [Q. Vague No. 21].

15].⁴¹ In response to the institutionalisation of rebellion, punk's dynamism led to the endorsement of do-it-yourself (DiY) principles. The participatory nature of punk was evident in the alternative press that grew up around it. The most famous punk fanzine was London's Sniffing Glue, but such media spread out well beyond the confines of the capital, back into the suburbs where Reid's Suburban Press had first started: Zero in Welwyn Gardens, Harsh Reality from Kent. Some, like No Class, explicitly picked up on and covered anarchist politics.

The types of autonomous politics associated with punk could involve finding personal solutions to larger socio-political problems. Penny Rimbaud of the band Crass, active from 1978 to 1984, was prominent in promoting individual self-help responses to larger crises. This was later derided by class struggle anarchists such as Nigel Fox of the AWG as 'lifestylist romanticism' (or 'lifestylism'). Crass's DiY often seemed to substitute pleasant, individualistic activities, such as growing medicinal herbs and forming co-ops, for 'developing and testing out a coherent strategy that could win people over to the struggle against capitalism' [Fox, 1988e, 6]. In other words this form of punk autonomy accepted the possibility of personal liberation while the vast majority was still oppressed.

Crass's politics were diverse; its vision was often closer to that of Max Stirner, where the egoistic individual was to be subject to no constraints, regardless of the harm caused to those less powerful than the him/herself. For this reason it was derided as merely 'prosaic laissez-faire individualism' [Q. Simon Reynolds, McKay, 1996, 98]. On other occasions it promoted an anarcho-feminist sensibility alongside a forceful anti-militarism [McKay, 1996, 78 & 19].⁴² The sizeable following around Crass became interested in environmental direct action, animal rights, vegetarianism and veganism [McKay, 1996, 131].

The anarcho-punk agent of change was unclear. On the few occasions it was explicitly elucidated it seemed to reject class, and appealed to the same great hope of the 60s hippie culture - 'youth'. As a result of such shared characteristics, it is no surprise that punk met a similar fate to that of the 1960s (over the counter)cultures it originally despised. It became a youth orientated marketing niche, subsumed into the mainstream of corporate business. Punk clothing and records could be found in the companies owned by multinationals.

Punk, nevertheless, directed a whole new section of people, predominantly the white, male young into anarchist groups. The new entrants' aggressive attitude helped to revitalise libertarian movements. Despite Crass's own pacifist origins its politics was often only a starting point for its youthful audience's more aggressive and collective activity. Crass's popularity also assisted anarchist and related causes more directly through their benefit gigs. Their success helped to promote a chic anarchist message, much in the way that the group Chumbawamba advanced a similar moral aesthetic throughout the late 1980s and 1990s.

The increase of interest caught several of the anarchist groups unaware. In many instances these movements were in disarray. In 1977 the AWA split in two, with one group becoming the Anarchist Communist Association (ACA), which died out in 1980, and the remains of the AWA changing its name to the Libertarian Communist Group (LCG) and attempting to refine its organisation [Organise! No. 42, Spring 1996, 17-18]. The LCG's opposition to Trotskyism did not prevent them from co-operating with avowedly marxist groupings such as Big Flame. As a result some activists became influenced by Trotskyist tactics at the time and joined the Labour Party [Organise! No. 42, Spring, 1996, 18]. Other groups also changed their structures as a result of the influx of new punkier anarchists. The Direct Action Movement (DAM) managed to preserve some organisational coherence when it was formed in 1979 out of the last surviving remnants of the 1950s SWF and it grew throughout the early years of the 1980s [Longmore, 1985, 20 & Fox, 1988e, 8]. Elsewhere the renewal of interest in anarchism resulted in the formation of smaller, regional groups, organising around local issues.

The election in 1979 selected a radical right-wing Prime Minister one of whose principle aims was the control of the trade unions. Industrial unrest had brought down the last Labour and Conservative administrations. The effects of Margaret Thatcher's policies were to break the power of organised labour by a strategy of criminalising previously legitimate industrial methods and mass unemployment. The destruction of jobs and wealth in the working class centres of major conurbations saw the escalation of inner-city riots. To some anarchists, the massive urban unrest of 1981 was a symbol of utopian promise, 'like a summer with a thousand Julys' to borrow a phrase [Smith, Speed, Tucker & June, 1982]. They welcomed the actions of large numbers of inner-city residents, uniting from all races, ethnicities and sub-cultures (Rastafarians, Asians, Jews, skinheads, punks), attacking centres of oppression (police stations), redistributing goods and challenging the control of the state [Smith, Speed et. al., 1982, 4-5, 9-10, 20, 25n].⁴³ Such acts were collective but autonomous. The uprisings were completely outside the orbit of the Labour Party or the trade unions and beyond the comprehension of any of the many revolutionary vanguards [Smith, Speed, et. al., 1982, 21 & 23]. These spontaneous insurrections terrified the ruling class.

The Conservative government appeared to actively exacerbate social, economic and ethnic divisions. Supported by members of what were, at the time considered the far right, the government helped to intensify the Cold War.⁴⁴ This stimulated public interest in CND, and drew in a substantial number of Women's Groups such as Women Oppose Nuclear Threat (WONT) and the Feminist & Nonviolence Study Group (F&NSG). The Peace movement provided opportunities for greater participation by women. One such example was the creation of women-controlled protest camps such as Greenham Common. This in turn promoted feminist analyses of social conflict and created new methods of protest. Women's groups developed organisational structures that had many parallels with anarchism, favouring localised activities and inclusive, flexible, democratic structures. Feminism not only opened up questions concerning the limits of class struggle anarchism's traditional analysis of capitalism, but also of formal structures of radical organisations. This revived the old prejudice that feminism was weakening the class struggle.⁴⁵ Feminism also raised the question of whether all forms of hierarchy were reducible to the economic or whether patriarchy and other oppressive forces such as racism and militarism predated capitalism.

It was within the context of renewed interest in unilateralist mobilisation that Class War first appeared. The newspaper Class War was produced in Swansea in early 1983 by a local group - the same group had produced the influential Alarm news-sheet, a publication which had repeatedly embarrassed the corrupt local council [Solidarity No. 13, 11-3]. Class War was produced by 'long-time anarchists who, being well-versed in the movement's history, were able to apply this knowledge to the production of propaganda' [Home, 1988, 95]. While the liberal anarchist movement drew support from CND, Class War gloried in ridiculing their pacifism and its middle-class paternalism [Class War, 'The Best Cut of All' issue 1985e, 2].

The first Thatcher government's economic and industrial policies provoked the Labour Party to become more left wing, albeit in a statist and paternalistic form, with Tony Benn gaining greater influence. This period also saw the ascendance of small Trotskyist groups who had entered the Labour Party, the most prominent being Militant Tendency, which promoted a strategy of confrontation through local municipal councils. The dominant organisational tactic to oppose the free-market reconstruction of society was through entry into the Labour Party. The LCG, already compromised by close co-operation with Trotskyist groupings, ended up supporting Labour Party radicals.

9. The Revival of Class Struggle Anarchism: The Miners' Strike to J18: 1984 - 1999

The main enemy of the Conservative administration on entering government was the National Union of Miners (NUM), whose industrial activities in 1972-4 had led to the fall from power of Heath, Thatcher's Conservative predecessor. In opposition, leading Conservatives had plotted how to destroy the power of organised labour and in particular the powerful Miner's union (the Ridley plan). In 1984, the Conservatives were still popular following the successful defence of the Falkland Islands. The police were given substantial pay rises as 'a precaution against any police force doubting whose side they were on in the civic struggles to come' [Hugo Young, The Guardian December 14, 1993, 22]. After a false start in 1981 when coal stocks were too low and miners' unity too steadfast, by 1984 circumstances were opportune to crush the miners [MacGregor, 1986, 116].

The Miners' Strike looms large in all recent histories of British anarchism, for it indicated a firm return to its class struggle origins. As Ian MacGregor, the chairman of the NCB, proclaims 'It was civil war' [MacGregor, 1986, 170]. It was a class conflict between a vengeful government supported by a rabid media and para-military police force⁴⁶, against a militant industrial workforce supported by their local communities (fig. 1.4.) and co-ordinated by a trade union with a history of radicalism piloted by an autocratic, and increasingly unpopular leader.

The strike events in 1984-5 were a direct class-based confrontation of the government's energy, industrial and finance policies. Dave Douglass, a NUM delegate for Hatfield who was sympathetic to syndicalism and Class War, argues that if the miners had won '[it] is doubtful whether Thatcher could have survived and all the misery, war and deprivation caused by her government, need never have happened' [Douglass, 1992e, 14]. For Class War and the other main anarchist groups, the working class was recognised as the revolutionary force that could obstruct the programmes of the almost impregnable Conservative government. The Wapping dispute confirmed the judgement that it was unfeasible to doubt the importance and relevance of class in confronting state power. The government used a large range of state apparatuses to destroy collective power in the workplace and to restructure potentially disruptive local communities (fig. 1.5.) Strike support, however, raised new questions about the appropriate reaction to trade unions. The ACF continued to reject any involvement while Class War had members, such as Douglass, who held union positions.

Class War's darkly humorous propaganda had originally been aimed at the post-punk milieu of hippie-punk squatters and prostitutes who lived in the same area. The social conflict in the coalfields enabled Class War (CW) to link up with groups and individuals outside of the anarcho-punk ghetto [Fox, 1988e, 8]. Close links were created between CW and a group of Doncaster miners, in which the anarchists provided propaganda and financial support. CW gained significant support from strikers because of its populist publicity in favour of miners' autonomous activities. The 'Hit Squads' (groups of miners who carried out direct physical attacks on scabs and NCB property) were despised by the NCB and their governmental supporters, and disowned by the NUM and their fellow travellers. Yet the strikers supported their actions. Although CW never had more than 150 formal members it had significantly more supporters [Class War Issue 73, Summer 1997, 2]. At its height Class War claims to have sold 15,000 to 20,000 copies per issue: 'miners queued 20 or more for the paper at the big Mansfield demonstration in 1984' success of a size which 'to be honest we could hardly believe ourselves' [Class War, 1991e, 4; Class War Issue 73, 2].

Class War built up its reputation in the popular imagination by playing on the worst fears and prejudices of the 1980s ruling class and used the ignorance and naivety of mainstream journalists to full effect [Home, 1988, 95]. Class War glorified everything that Thatcherism condemned: working class solidarity, anti-market-communism, and violent hatred for the rich.

In the two years between the appearance of the first "Class War" newspaper in 1983 and the 'hot autumn' of '85, the British media began to write of an 'anarchist menace' which was the equal of any 'red scare'. For the first time since the Angry Brigade bombings of the early seventies, anarchism was perceived as a threat to the British establishment [Home, 1988, 95].⁴⁷

⁴⁷ Home's history is not altogether accurate. The Person's Unknown prosecution of 1978-9 (Ronan Bennett,

Class War took part in the Stop the City (STC) demonstrations that took place from September 1983, to September 1985. STC involved disrupting the functioning of the financial districts of major cities through low level sabotage, such as blocking up the locks of major institutions and gluing up bank machines. It organised stunts that would build up the solidarity of its supporters, scare the ruling class and gain media publicity for their brand of free-communism. In 1985 Class War restructured itself into a formal organisation, the Class War Federation (CWF) blending a loose amalgam of like-minded groups and individuals into a more formal membership organisation. At first this changing structure increased their ambition. In 1987-8 CWF organised a Rock Against the Rich tour with Joe Strummer, formerly from the punk band The Clash [Class War No. 28, 3]. CWF organised a Bash the Rich demonstration held in the affluent Kensington area of London in May 1985 complete with banners proclaiming 'behold your future executioners'. This was repeated in Hampstead (in September 1985) with less success as the police had learnt how to control the mob [Home, 1988, 99 & Bone, 1997, 9].

Class War cherished the urban rioters. As opposed to anarcho-syndicalists, Class War believed that in terms of practical tactics, communities rather than workplaces were the centre of resistance to middle Trevor Dawton, Taff Ladd, Mills, Vince Stevenson - Stewart Carr was tried separately) had allowed the press to indulge in anarchist-terror stories in the interim. In 1978 the police arrested six anarchists and accused them of planning a bombing campaign in the manner of the Red Army Faction and the Red Brigades. The prosecution failed despite an exhaustive police investigation and the imprisonment of the six because no trace of explosive was ever discovered [Freedom: Supplement Vol 40, No. 16, 8 September, 1979, 9-17] class forces.

Battles in the community - over control of territory, space and time - have become the pivotal point of today's struggle.

The only paper that reflected this new battleground was Class War. The ungovernability of our class was celebrated in its pages whenever and wherever it broke out [Bone, Pullen & Scargill, 1991, 9].

Workplace battles were still important, but the changes in the economy had restricted their effectiveness, albeit temporarily. As a result of this emphasis on community revolt, Class War was widely associated with the promotion of and involvement in urban rioting. Journalists for the mainstream press blamed CWF for starting the riots.⁴⁸ Along with other class struggle anarchist groups, Class War were also held responsible for the disturbances after the London Poll Tax demnstartion of 1990 and the commotion after the march against the British National Party (BNP) at Welling in 1993. The coverage CWF received was viewed with some jealousy by the orthodox left, yet even its critics admitted that CWF's populist approach attracted a new constituency into revolutionary politics [O'Brien, 1992e].

CWF thrived during the build-up of opposition to the Poll Tax, but soon afterwards went into decline. In 1992 the Conservative government under John Major announced a massive pit closure policy predicted by Scargill and denounced as lies by McGregor which brought about the destruction of the industry [MacGregor, 1986, 117]. A quarter of million people took part in a protest march, but the miners, defeated in 1985, were in no position to undergo another long strike. The protests fizzled out. In the CWF arguments over the response to this renewed attack on the miners exacerbated existing tensions. The large demonstrations, which provided a market for Class War's paper, had receded, and Bone and many others, who had been responsible for their most imaginative stunts, had left.

Tim Scargill led a short-lived, tiny breakaway faction in 1993, the Class War Organisation (CWO) [Class War, No. 59, 13]. By 1997 the remainder of CWF split into two. One side announced the closure of the organisation and produced an edition of the newspaper that was supposed to be the last: 'Class War is dead... Long Live the class war!' [Class War, Issue 73, Summer 1997, 1]. The other side continued to produce a version of the paper in an unavailing attempt to reproduce its earlier vivacity. The section of the CWF that wished to disband hoped to work more closely with other anarchist groups [Class War, Issue 73, 2 & 16]. These included the environmental, but non-class struggle, grouping Reclaim The Streets (RTS)⁴⁹ [Public Meeting, Conway Hall, London, 17/7/97] and the A(C)F. Despite lingering acrimony, both sides of the CWF split co-operated with each other and continued to work with the AF and other anarchists in campaigns such as the Anti-Elections Alliance (AEA) and Movement Against the Monarchy (MA'M) as well as in the June 18th 1999 Carnival Against Capitalism (also known as J18).⁵⁰

Britain is the Solidarity Federation (SolFed). This was previously known as the DAM and traces continuous links back to the SWF, the syndicalist section of the AFB of the 1950s. Whereas CWF and the ACF prioritised community struggles, anarcho-syndicalists have traditionally placed greater stress on the workplace as the most suitable site for class conflict. The favoured structures were the revolutionary syndicates made up of workers in particular industries, rather than split into trades.

Prior to 1987 DAM had sought support for anarcho-syndicalist unions elsewhere in the world, but due to organisational weakness and the strength of trade unionism here, it merely supported general industrial militancy in Britain. Between 1987 and 1988 it grew more ambitious and attempted unsuccessfully to set up separate anarcho-syndicalist unions to rival reformist trade unions. The only independent union they formed was the Dispatch Industry Workers Union (DIWU), to assist the non-unionised bicycle, motorcycle and van-driver couriers in 1989 [Direct Action, No. 77, 4]. The union lasted less than five years.

In 1994 DAM changed its name to the Solidarity Federation (SolFed) and altered its industrial strategy [Direct Action, Spring 1997, No. 2, 35]. It no longer attempts to build separate anarcho-syndicalists unions but networks of militants within sectors of industry: transport, education, communication and public services. It also organises 'locals' community-based organisations made up of SolFed members [Direct Action, Spring 1997, No. 2, 35]. SolFed remains a member of the International Workers Association in which the Spanish CNT is still the major section. A Six Counties' group

Organise was also a signatory until it folded in 1999. Also working on a syndicalist strategy are British branches of the remnants of the American IWW. Networks such as the Trade Union Network of Anarchists (TUNA also referred to as @TU) combine syndicalists, trade union activists and dual strategists.⁵¹

The change in policy in 1987 to form separate unions led to a split from a group called the Anarchist Workers Group (AWG). They considered the DAM project to be an inappropriate use of their efforts, as all unions, including anarcho-syndicalist ones, were reformist. This was because the function of unions was to negotiate with employers. Separate anarcho-syndicalist unions merely split radicals from their constituent [AWG, 1988a, 2]. In their place, the AWG strategy proposed setting up rank-and-file movements in existing unions [AWG, 1988b, 23]. Rank-and-file groups of trade unionist (no union officials) revolutionaries would propagandise and build up militancy.

The AWG adopted The Platform of Libertarian Communism (The Platform) and a cadre form of organisation. The Platform was written by Russian anarchists who had fled from the Bolshevik counterrevolution. These had included Nestor Makhno, Piotr Arshinov and Ida Mett. It argued for a tighter organisational framework. Many regarded The Platform at the time as an attempt to Bolshevise anarchism; consequently other British libertarians accused the AWG of Leninism. The AWG's membership never rose above 20 and its influence was further reduced, partly as a result of taking sides with the Iraqi dictatorship during the 1991 Gulf War [Homocult, 1996, 21]. As if to confirm its critics' accusations of incipient Bolshevism, several of its members joined the Revolutionary Communist Party (RCP) [Homocult, 1996, 30]. The only remaining openly platformist grouping in the British Isles is the 26 Counties-based Workers Solidarity Movement (WSM). Unusually for an anarchist group, it actively participates in constitutional procedures, supporting referenda options for abortion and divorce.

Amongst the other major anarchist groups were the ACF which developed from individuals who had left the wreckage of the LCG. These individuals formed the Libertarian Communist Discussion Group (LCDG) in 1984 distributing former LCG materials, including The Platform. While originally interested in The Platform, the ACF later turned to Georges Fontenis' less centralist Manifesto of Libertarian Communism as their guide.

The LCDG became friendly with an individual who had produced his own anarcho-socialist magazine Virus, which became their journal [Virus, No. 5, 2]. The group then changed its name to the Anarchist-Communist Discussion Group (ACDG) and through Virus promoted anarchist-communism and distributed Solidarity materials [Virus, No. 7, 16].⁵² In 1986 the ACDG was joined by Syndicalist Fight (SyF), a splinter group from DAM. The combined group became the ACF [Organise!, Issue 42, 19]. In 1991 the Economic League considered the ACF to be '[i]n its militancy and commitment to violence [...] second only to Class War' [Economic League, 1991a, 11]. In 1999 the ACF changed its name again to the Anarchist Federation (AF) but this does not indicate a change in its (anti-)political orientation.

Despite its relatively low numbers (counted in their dozens rather than the hundreds), the AF has significant influence because of its cordial relationships with other groups [Anarchist 1993 Yearbook, 1992e, 4]. As well as working with both sides of the CWF it also held joint meetings with other groupings such as the autonomous marxist Subversion group, based in the North West of England. Subversion and the A(C)F had much in common, both being consistent in their opposition to national liberation movements and trade unionism.

Subversion was a council communist grouping that had split from the council communist Wildcat group. Subversion not only co-operated with the ACF but also with libertarian marxist groupings such as Red Menace [The Red Menace No. 2, March 1989, 2]. Although Subversion was tiny in terms of its formal membership, produced a regular free magazine (Subversion), and it was vigorous throughout the period of the Poll Tax, especially in the North West of England. It was also involved in claimants' campaigns before petering out in 1998. A loose federation of autonomous marxist sections still operates which centres on the Brighton-based Aufheben collective.

Wildcat was the most libertarian of the council-communist groupings in Britain, (others still existing include the International Communist Current (ICC) and Communist Workers Organisation (CWO)). Wildcat, however, became more sympathetic to a primitivist orientation [Wildcat, No. 17, Spring 1994, 9-21]. Primitivism, with its roots in Sorel's The Illusions of Progress, rejects aspects of Marx's theory of history, in particular the view that communism can only come about once capitalism has progressed to a particularly advanced technological stage. Primitivism celebrates pre-technological societies and rejects civilisation as an ahuman imposition.

The main primitivist current today is Green Anarchist (GA). It was formed after the 1984 STC demonstration called by London Greenpeace [PNR, 1992, 14] - a radical environmental movement with no direct link to Greenpeace. London Greenpeace was famous in the 1990s for the heroic activities of two of its members, Dave Morris and Helen Steel, who were stoical defendants named by McDonalds in Britain's longest libel trial. The so-called McLibel Two were prosecuted by the billion-dollar fast-food business for distributing leaflets criticising the working conditions, nutritional composition and environmental damage associated with the company's product.

The magazine Green Anarchist, now a newspaper, was produced by activists inspired by the environmental movements of the 1960s and 70s, and who had been on the fringes of the Ecology Party (now the Green Party). Albon, one of the earliest members of the editorial team was a pacifist writer for Freedom and as a result, early editions of Green Anarchist followed similar non-violent and liberal lines [Booth, 1996, 67]. Green Anarchist did not recognise the class implications of the Wapping dispute, Albon's editorial for the magazine condemned the striking print-workers for their sexism and racism and previous lack of solidarity. Although the News International printers had been an unsympathetic lot,⁵³ Albon's editorial: 'created a sectarian gulf between GA and the Class Struggle Anarchists, which lingers on to this day' [Booth, 1996, 74].

The commitment to pacifism promoted by Albon was out of keeping with the spirit of the time and further alienated the network of Green anarchists from the rest of the libertarian movement who were becoming increasingly involved in practical class struggle on the picket lines. The violence of the industrial disputes and the police riot against the modern nomads, the travellers, in the Battle of the Beanfield in 1985 demonstrated the lengths to which the state was prepared to go to attack those who rejected the values of the free-market [McKay, 1996, 33-34].

Richard Hunt joined the editorial board, and Green Anarchist pursued a version of class politics at the expense of the Christian, pacifist supporters. The potential revolutionary agents were those who lived on the economic periphery, that is, the peasantry in the Third World. The affluence of the industrial workers in the Western hemisphere made them a revolutionary irrelevance [PNR, 1992, 16]. Hunt left to set up his own magazine Alternative Green when he was unable to impose his will on the editorial board of Green Anarchist - especially on the issue of the Gulf War (in which Hunt supported Western intervention). This new journal promoted hierarchy ('pecking order') and the sexual division of labour in which males had the patriarchal role of protecting females [Alternative Green No. 3, Summer 1992, 10-11]. Alternative Green was subsequently denounced by GA.

Despite these set backs, GA's continued commitment to direct action in pursuit of animal rights and environmental issues and in particular, anti-road campaigns, has maintained the popularity of their newspaper. They sell around 4,000 copies an issue. The connection between the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) and Green Anarchist has been the main feature of state interest in GA. Police raided bookshops selling Green Anarchist in 1995 and instituted the GANDALF (GA-aND-ALF) trial. Six editors of Green Anarchist and ALF Supporters Group Newsletter faced prosecution for reporting ALF activities. The authorities believed that these accounts were inciting similar actions [Green Anarchist No.47-48, 1]. The defendants in November 1997 received custodial sentences of up to three years, without the prosecution ever having to show that the publications had inspired one criminal act. They were eventually released after an appeal.

Also active in the environmental anarchist arena are Earth First! (EF!), a group which has its origins in an American ecological campaigning movement of the same name [Byrne, 1997, 130]. Although EF! formed because they considered Greenpeace to be too tactically restrained, Green Anarchists such as Booth have in turn criticised EF! for their bureaucratic tendencies and a preference for symbolic rather than direct action [Byrne, 1997, 22 & 27; Booth, 1996, 84-6]. Class War have, in the past, similarly criticised environmentalists for their liberalism. Groupings like the Green Party (GP) and Friends of the Earth (FoE) are accused of attempting to create a cross-class alliance against environmental threats which should be understood as the result of exploitation [Class War, No. 41, 8-9].

The division between class-struggle anarchist and environmental radicals has substantially lessened. Their histories and tactics have encouraged avenues of co-operation between class struggle groupings, RTS and British EF!. The class struggle groupings have increasingly involved themselves in environmental actions such as joining in anti-roads protests, and the class-based issues arising from ecological actions [see Aufheben No.3, 11]. RTS and EF! have increasingly accepted a critique of capitalism as a fundamental feature of their propaganda and consider the working class to be at least in part one of the agents of social transformation. The recognition that one of the main oppressive powers operating in environmental degradation is exploitation for profit, lead to links being made between Green campaigners and traditional working class groups. The co-operation between RTS and other radical environmental groups and the striking Liverpool Dockers, for example, culminated in the March for Social Justice events in 1997 (figure

1.6.). They also collaborated with London Underground workers in 1998. The links of solidarity between environmentalists and class struggle anarchists were further developed with the J18 'Carnival against Capitalism' which saw the City of London targeted by 10,000 protestors. And later with N30 and Mayday 2000 protests

J18 saw a wide range of anarchist groups co-ordinated in planning J18. With the emphasis on mutual solidarity, they co-operated in the multiple targeting of financial houses, multinationals (including McDonalds) and those, like the TUC, who discipline workers. The participants initiated the creation of autonomous zones where private motor vehicles were prohibited access. People partied and sunbathed along King William Street on a Friday afternoon having ousted the rush hour traffic.

This co-operative venture between groups signified the greater confidence in anarchist groups in creating solidarity networks. Prior to the Poll Tax, most anarchist activity was centred upon following Leninist campaigns and offering critiques rather than initiating distinct campaigns. The significance of Leninist groups, however, diminished even faster after the fall of the Berlin Wall, although they had already gone into decline. Other factors for the decline the state-socialist tradition include the disastrous handling of Liverpool council by Militant and its subsequent expulsion from the Labour Party which destroyed its political strategy and the internal frictions within such authoritarian parties that lead to organisational fragmentation. The disintegration of much of the Revolutionary Left meant that is no longer possible, nor relevant, to tail-end the events organised by them.

The high media profile of anarchism, partly as a result of Class War's stunts, and the crumbling of the Leninist hegemony, resulted in considerable interest in anarchism from constituencies who might previously have been attracted by orthodox marxism. The victorious campaign against the Poll Tax also provided experience in organising events and arranging publicity, and raised the level of aspiration. Anarchists became more willing to organise their own events and develop the co-operative networks instigated by the Anti-Poll Tax campaign.

The Gulf War of 1990-1 prompted the setting up of the No War But The Class War (NWBTCW) grouping made up of all the main anarchist groups, except notably the AWG who supported for the Iraqi state against Western imperialism [White & Gordon, 1990, 24].⁵⁴ NWBTCW tried to create an understanding of Imperialism and global capitalism which was independent of Leninism, yet according to Aufheben

⁵⁴ AWG, like NWBTCW, also expressed support for the Iraqi opposition to Saddam Hussein [White & Gordon,

NWBTCW in 1991 was still concerned with defining itself against state-socialism rather than undertaking autonomous activity.⁵⁵

Anarchist networks throughout the 1990s became increasingly more ambitious. In April 1992 1,500 people took place on an anarchist organised Anti-Elections demonstration,⁵⁶ even though permission for the march had been withdrawn by the state, making it then the largest anarchist organised demonstration for decades (subsequently exceeded by J18). For the first time in a century tiny factions of the Left were tail-ending anarchic initiatives rather than the other way around.

These networks have become more sophisticated and adventurous. In local areas class-struggle groups and environmental campaigns have come together to swap information and find areas for solidarity. Brighton's Rebel Alliance was the first, followed by Norwich Solidarity, Manchester Direct Action, Nottingham Association of Subversive Activists, and London Underground, amongst others.

British anarchism remains continually in flux with groups appearing, dissolving, reappearing and combining. It is made up of organisations with distinct structures, who appeal to different constituencies and promote different tactics. At the end of the Nineteenth Century, it was immigrant workers and radical industrial organisation that characterised anarchism. In the 1930s it was refugees from fascism and the support for CNT that united the British anarchist movement. In the late 1950s and into the 1960s the New Left and the corresponding counterculture that provided opportunities for new forms of expression and experimentation in communal arrangements, although these rarely challenged economic relations. With the recession of the 1970s and Conservative retrenchment of the 1980s anarchism began to rediscover the importance of economic as well as other forms of oppression. In the most recent period under review, 1984-1999, anarchists have been involved in a host of organisations and used a multitude of tactics. They have given technical welfare advice to squatters and asylum seekers and provided fund-raising for strikers and prisoners. Most spectacularly they have been in the forefront of anti-capitalist and anti-government riots. From the protests against the 1994 Criminal Justice Act to the festivities of J18. This 1994 Act provoked disturbances in the centre of London. The Hyde Park railings again became weapons in the hands of anarchists just as they had for Kitz and Lane over a century earlier. For behind the apparent diversity of actions, a result of the historical context in which they occur, there is amongst the main anarchist strands a consistent framework which sees means, ends and agency as inseparable.

Anarchist Moral Theory and Practice

Chapter Two

Anarchist Moral Theory and Practice

Introduction

This chapter performs a number of tasks under two main headings. The first, 'The Prefigurative Ethical Framework' (Part One), devises a procedure for evaluating anarchism that is consistent with libertarianism. The second (Part Two) examines the category of behaviour associated with anarchism, 'direct action' and shows how it accords with prefiguration.

The system of evaluation is constructed from the fragments of contemporary British class-struggle writings that deal with tactics and ways of choosing between alternatives. The model of appraisal, prefiguration, involves the means being consistent with the desired ends, and, as discussed in more detail in Chapter Three, a specific type of moral agent. An ideal type of anarchism is developed with which to assess various examples of contemporary British libertarian behaviour. In their ideal form, anarchist tactics have immediate practical consequences as well as pursuing wider social goals. The longer-term objectives are achieved through expansion and interaction with other prefigurative behaviours. Prefiguration is assessed against competing moral theories in order to demonstrate the strengths of the libertarian ethic, and its distinctiveness in terms of methods and organisation.¹

Prefiguration is most often identified in 'direct action' - a category of (anti-)political behaviour favoured by anarchists. The importance of direct action as a category of behaviour is the subject of Part Two. Tactics of this type embody the aim. In the ideal anarchist form of direct action, the oppressed themselves are directly involved in resisting or oppressive power. The agent of change is unmediated. Direct action is carried out in order to achieve self-emancipation but also has immediate short term results. In discussing direct action, one of the most frequently raised questions arising from prefiguration, that concerning the principle of pacifism is assessed. Close scrutiny shows that certain behaviours that are labelled 'violent' are still consistent with anarchism.

PART I

The Prefigurative Ethical Framework

Part One discusses the morality of anarchist methods, yet applying ethics to revolutionary activity face three objections. The first concerns problems of identifying 'anarchism', the second, the unwillingness by some class struggle libertarians to accept that ethics has any part to play in evaluating their methods, and the third, the problem of finding a suitable method for such an assessment. This chapter is not concerned with the first, as groups and criteria are identified in the introduction and developed in the opening chapter, but deals predominantly with the second and the third of these criticisms. This part concentrates on sketching out a prefigurative ethics, and demonstrates its advantages over deontological (Kantian) and utilitarian ethical approaches. We start, however, by explaining the pertinence of ethical evaluation to anarchist behaviours.

1. Against Ethics

Some anarchists have given a number of reasons for rejecting the relevance of moral evaluation. One argument advanced takes as its basis economic determinism, a theory that concludes that change is dependent on the workings of the economy. As the productive forces are the motor for change the subjective intentions of actors are immaterial (superstructural) and therefore any form of moral evaluation is irrelevant. Other critics consider ethics to be a middle class preoccupation where those in elite positions, who cannot comprehend the situations on which they pontificate, place an unsuitable evaluative framework on anarchist tactics. Those who have attempted ethical evaluations of class-struggle methods seem to confirm these views - examples of moral appraisal have come either from academics such as Alan Ritter and David Miller, or from the liberal anarchist traditions, which include Giovanni Baldelli, Marshall, Woodcock, and more recently Randall Amster. Many of these critics have analysed anarchism using liberal, Kantian categories which, as will be shown later in this chapter, not only have substantial drawbacks in terms of general meta-ethical shortcomings but are particularly ineffectual in assessing class struggle methods.

A widespread anti-ethical stance can be traced to the wider socialist political movements. It is exemplified by a phrase ascribed to Brecht: 'Bread first, then ethics'. The political philosopher Alan Carling describes the view that as human action is economically determined the struggle of the oppressed is not amenable to ethics. Consequently, relevant behaviour is either heteronomously fixed or morality is a 'luxury item, and the poor cannot afford luxuries' [Carling, 1992, 231-5]. Such divisions between the subjectivities of individuals and the economic base have long been criticised as inappropriately restricting the identification of the realm of economic oppression by autonomist marxists such as Cleaver [Cleaver, 1979, 12-6]. Purely determinist accounts rob oppressed groups of any moral subjective agency. They are therefore incompatible with anarchism as a liberation movement for the oppressed, as anarchism posits a subjugated agent who consciously creates non-hierarchical structures to overthrow the repressive practices.

The second of the criticisms raised by Carling - that the resolution of unbearable social conditions allows for no discrimination in methods - appears occasionally in anarchist propaganda but does not stand up to scrutiny.² There is justifiable hostility by the oppressed towards those not undergoing such privation who pronounce on appropriate actions. However, subjugated agents may still choose how they secure their bread, so ethical appraisal is relevant.

Moral evaluation of (anti-)political behaviour is not alien to anarchism. On the contrary, the WSM illustrate that the recognition of the importance of ethical considerations marks libertarianism off from many traditional marxist groups. In a critique of Leninist policies, Andrew Flood of the WSM describes how:

[M]any can admit the Russian revolution was in part destroyed by the politics of Bolshevism, but they can only do so after first making clear that their critique is not related to the 'moralism' of the anarchists. This is the hallmark of an organisation which never sees itself as addressing 'ordinary people'. Who in their right mind would approach such a discussion with 'I've nothing against shooting leftists to achieve revolution, but it does not work.' The anarchists were full of moral indignation and quite right too! But they also argue that terror was crushing the revolution by destroying initiative and debate [Flood, 1994, 7].

Morality is not separate from, nor identical to, practical results, but the one informs the other. Flood states that not only must the ends be humane, emancipatory and diverse, but the methods also have to be morally acceptable, independently of the ends. The question is not whether to use a moral framework to assess anarchist methods, but which.

Inappropriate ethical assessments derived from other ideological positions are likely to disfigure and dismiss anarchism. Academic approaches to political writings often omit the most important features of revolutionary writings. As Cleaver suggests, works such as Marx's Capital are wrongly viewed as being primarily exercises in political economy or ontological theorising rather than as practical advice to oppressed subject groups [Cleaver, 1979, 3 & 7]. An analysis of anarchism should use a method which recognises that libertarianism comes from and addresses particular audiences. The prefigurative framework that forms the ideal type anarchist model is derived from anarchism's own professed evaluative approaches. Ideal type anarchism is used to assess the tactics (including organisational structures) of contemporary libertarians. The latter part of the chapter elucidates this method in connection with 'direct action' - the category of (anti-)political methods identified with anarchism.

2. The Prefigurative Method.

An interest in, and development of, a method of ethical evaluation is not new to anarchism. Kropotkin's last work was a treatise on ethics [Woodcock, 1992, xix].³ Consciously or not, anarchist activists frequently evaluate their actions and those of their opponents in ethical terms. It is the consideration of whether libertarian methods are consistent with the type of agency they wish to appeal to and the aims they wish to achieve that provides the framework of evaluation for this thesis. It is a form of assessment that can be discerned in the earliest predecessors of many forms of anarchisms. It also provides a heuristic device for indicating areas that lack clarity and reveal contradictions or omissions in various anarchist programmes.

The dialogues between anarchism and other forms of political action, primarily Leninism and liberal democracy, have often focused on the question of tactics. These debates have frequently been about determining the relationship of means reflecting ends. The anarchist position has been characterised by the oft-quoted comment of James Guillaume, a colleague of Bakunin: 'How could one want an equalitarian and free society to issue from authoritarian organisation? It is impossible' [Bakunin, 1984, 7]. Similarly, the difference between Kropotkin and Sergei Nechaev, as the anarchist historian Paul Avrich remarks, is one in which the first maintained that the ends and means were inseparable while the latter prioritised objectives exclusively [Avrich, 1987 7-8 & 29].

The persistent claim that there is a dynamic relationship between the methods and ends also appears in contemporary groups. The ACF states: 'Anarchists believe that there is a strong correlation between means and ends and this means freedom is not something that can be granted to us by politicians' [Organise!, April-June 1992, No. 26, 20]. This tactical question of methods prefiguring aims and involving the subjugated agents themselves marks libertarianism out from its socialist competitors. The abandonment of any predisposition for either means or ends is also a rejection of both Kantian, deontological and utilitarian consequentialist ethics. Libertarianism still maintains the self-referential principles of anti-representation and prefiguration but does not propose an overall blueprint or universal end point. The ideal type anarchism constructed here recognises that it is impossible to impose a specific universal end because it recognises that it is not possible to predetermine the oppressive practices operating in a particular context. It is therefore not possible to predetermine the oppressive practices operating in all contexts. To use the terminology of Todd May anarchism is tactical rather than strategic. Tactical philosophies acknowledge a multitude of oppressive irreducible powers with no objective position that can identify how they would operate acontextually. Leninism, by contrast is strategic, it proposes that there is one central struggle which can be understood scientifically [May, 1994, 11-12 & 20].⁴

Anarchism acknowledges that there are consequences to actions. Intentions and desires have to be taken into account. Yet these ends are pragmatic and temporary and legitimacy of an act does not rest on these grounds alone. The four anarchist criteria described in the introduction (which exemplify anti-representation and anti-hierarchy), in an ideal form, do not impose a strategy of resistance, as such a positive methodology would only overcode or re-invigorate regulative social relations. As will be seen, applying a utopian blueprint would involve enforcing others to live under a social model designed by just a few individuals, thereby restricting autonomy and hence (re-)creating hierarchical social relations. Anarchist principles cannot be applied externally onto the subjugated agents. For a tactic to be regarded as liberatory, it must come from the subjugated group themselves, rather than be governed by the judgement of a group of revolutionaries, anarchists or otherwise (or any other mediating vanguard), a point returned to in the next chapter.

Anarchist principles are reflexive and self-creative, as they do not assess social practices against a universally prescribed end-point, as some utopian theorists have done, but through a process of immanent critique. The precepts behind an ideology are examined to show how they contradict the ideology in practice. In carrying out any sort of appraisal of existing social forms, new practices and social relations are formed. Through criticising and opposing the existing order anarchists develop emancipatory alternatives.⁵ For ideal type anarchism, means and ends are irreducible parts of the same process - and as a result one cannot be considered as more important than the other. By contrast Leninism asserts for itself an objective position from which it assesses situations and prescribes solutions. It regards ultimate aims as being scientifically determined and promotes specific ends over means. Lenin claims that a revolutionary project must concentrate on ends: '[W]e must temporarily make use of the instruments, resources, and methods of the state power against the exploiters' [Lenin, 1976, 74]. Leninism is instrumental, anarchism, in its ideal form, is prefigurative.

2.1. The Means-Ends Distinction

Aristotle was the first philosopher of note to make a distinction between means and ends. He developed a taxonomy in his Ethics through which acts could be understood and assessed. Aristotle's scientific approach was one in which choices of behaviour were identified through the application of categories such as means, ends and actors. This method remains influential in moral philosophy. The scientific approach was taken to extremes with Jeremy Bentham's hedonic calculus, which attempted to measure happiness with industrial codification.

Aristotle ranks acts into a hierarchy according to their proximity to the ultimate aim - namely achieving a state of eudaemonia or societal prosperity [Hardie, 1968, 15 & Hursthouse, 222-4]. Aristotle was not a strict consequentialist. He conceded that results were not the sole moral ground for assessing different acts as even unsuccessful endeavours can be virtuous, a view endorsed by anarchists [Aristotle, 1963, 15]. Anarchists also share Aristotle's link between virtuous behaviour and the moral agent, in which acts help form the identity of the subject that will perform the moral act. However there are important differences between the Ancient Greeks' and contemporary anarchism's in identifying this moral agent. For Aristotle, slaves and women were too irrational to be significant moral subjects. Instead, Aristotle sought to influence the powerful oligarchs and tyrants - to turn them into heroic individuals [Grayeff, 1974, 27 & 42]. Anarchists on the other hand consider that ethical change comes about when those affected by oppression overcome it through their actions. The agent of change in this scenario is democratic, fluctuating and wide ranging, as opposed to the Aristotelian champion, who is fixed into a hierarchy. While anarchists and Aristotle differ over the types of agency and the relationship between means and ends, it is through these moral categories developed in the Ethics that anarchist tactics are analyzed are analysed in this thesis.

3. Consequentialism

Foremost in the ethical theories that assess the efficacy of an action according to its success at attaining a particular end, is utilitarianism. Consequentialism, of which utilitarianism is a prime example, is also apparent in Leninism and utopianism. Leninism was the major opponent of libertarianism, the latter however was often associated with libertarianism. However, it will be shown that contemporary utopian writings play a different role, no longer based on encouraging the acceptance of a social blueprint of predetermined ends.

Neither the motives nor the intentions of the moral agent are significant for a consequentialist ethical theory, only the consequences of an act are relevant to its moral evaluation. Utilitarianism, for instance, involves the application of a simple formula, (devised by Bentham and later described by John Stuart Mill), which outlines their ends-based schema for assessment; 'actions are right in proportion as they tend to promote happiness, wrong as they tend to produce the reverse of happiness. By happiness is intended pleasure and the absence of pain; by unhappiness, pain, and the privation of pleasure' [Mill, 1987, 278]. It is the end point, a more restrictive notion of eudaemonia considered solely in terms of happiness, that provides the method for weighing the correctness or otherwise of an act. Even ignoring the potential difficulties of measuring the potential and actual happiness or misery of others, (a task made no easier by Bentham's utility calculus),⁶ there are still major drawbacks for determining the appropriateness of an act depending on its efficiency in delivering a predetermined end. Instrumental rationality, as categorised by Max Weber, ensues when methods are solely guided by consideration of the ends. The success of a plan is determined by its efficiency in meeting the objectives. 'A person acts rationally in the "means-ends" sense when his action is guided by consideration of ends, means and secondary consequence' [Weber, 1995, 29]. This is considered problematic for anarchists as it presumes having advanced knowledge of the desired aim. This is rejected by the tactical nature of anarchism (again covered in more detail in Chapter Three). Secondly, instrumentalism allows for oppressed subject groups to be used as mere implements, further reducing their autonomy.

3.1. Prefiguration Versus Consequentialism

Examples of instrumentalism appear in a variety of political propaganda⁷ including those of an anarchist inclination. However, consistent anarchism, unlike the revolutionary alternative with which libertarianism has often unsuccessfully competed, rejects such instances as incompatible with its prefigurative ethic. Foremost as an alternative to anarchism within working class movements was Leninism. Lenin constructed a model of political behaviour based on a consequentialist account. In "Left-Wing" Communism, An Infantile Disorder, Lenin proposes a wholly ends-determined framework for assessing and justifying political behaviours. Boycotts or participation in parliamentary elections, for example, are appraised on their ability to bring about revolutionary situations [Lenin, 1975, 21-22]. The direction of the masses through the model of the centralised party is similarly warranted on the basis of eventual ends [Lenin, 1975, 31 & Lenin, 1963, 144].

David Lamb, formerly of Solidarity, writing for the anarchist magazine Animal, explains the anarchist rejection of the Leninist approach thus:

[T]he distinction between ends and means has been drawn between humans and the natural world, masters and slaves, men and women, employers and employees, rulers and ruled. To be reduced to a means or an instrument is to be robbed of autonomy and responsibility and consequently to be of no direct moral significance [Lamb, 1997, 12].

Lamb's criticism of Leninism captures part of the twofold problem of consequentialism, that it undermines the autonomy of the subjugated group. Paternalistic socialism predetermines the objectives and imposes these ends onto the already subjugated classes. The client class - the proletariat - becomes the instrument used to reach this end.⁸ To quickly reach the desired end they can, therefore, be treated in an authoritarian manner.⁹ For ideal type anarchism the actions of the subjugated in overthrowing existing conditions. In doing so non-hierarchical social relations are constructed. No one can represent or act on behalf of the subjugated.

The second of the part of the problem of consequentialism is also criticised by Lamb - that in creating a hierarchy of means and ends, the race' [see MacDonald, 1980, 52].

former becomes a substitute for the latter. Explaining the Hegelian origins of this criticism of Leninism, Lamb recounts the dialectic of Master and Slave, in which the slave mediates between the Master's desires (end) and the natural world in order to fulfil the master's wishes. In doing so the slave learns the skills, while the master becomes dependent on the servant. As a result the slave (the means) becomes dominant over the lord (the ends). This dialectical process of means dominating ends is illustrated for libertarians by the domination of the bureaucracy in the post-1917 Soviet Union. The Party, which was supposed to be the means, becomes the ends [Lamb, 1997, 13]. By rejecting the necessity of a mediating group anarchism avoids the creation of a new hierarchy. Prefiguration avoids this Hegelian dilemma as means and ends are identical. The dialectical process of methods replacing objectives no longer applies.

3.2. Anarchist Consequentialism

Not everyone within the libertarian tradition rejects a consequentialist approach. Even those who repudiate utilitarianism recognise positive features of branches of ends-based moral theory in that it proposes integrating social welfare with, in Mill's case, individual freedom [Kropotkin, 1992, 241]. Some follow Benthamite utilitarianism and place pre-eminence on ends. Others - Johann Most and Sergei Nechaev, a confidant of Bakunin, urged a results-based approach.

Ethics? The end of revolution is freedom; the end justifies the means. The struggle for freedom is a war; wars are to be won and therefore to be waged with all energy, ruthlessly [...] using all there is to be used, including the latest in technology and the first of chemistry, to kill oppressors forthwith...' [Most, Trautmann, 1980, 99].

The revolutionary despises all doctrinairism and has rejected the mundane sciences leaving them to future generations. He knows only one science, the science of destruction. To this end, and this end alone, he will study mechanics, physics, chemistry and perhaps medicine [....] His sole and constant object is the immediate destruction of this vile order [Nechaev, 1989, 4-5].

Most's and Nechaev's ends-based entreaties have apparent parallels with some contemporary anarchists¹⁰ although they are inconsistent with prefiguration of ideal type anarchism. For Nechaev the autonomy of the oppressed was unimportant - anyone could be used as an instrument to achieve the predetermined end. [Nechaev, 1989, 9]. The instrumentalism of this approach lead Michael Prawdin to consider Nechaev a precursor to Leninism rather than anarchism [Prawdin, 1961].

Consequentialism can also be identified in the utopianism associated with anarchism. Socialist blue-prints that envisioned imaginative, heterodox forms of communal living and ingenious forms of manufacture and agriculture were drawn up by Charles Fourier for his Phalanxes. Other communal ideals include Campella's City of the Sun, Ivan Chtcheglov's experimental city and Nechaev's dictatorial, almost borstal-style, post-revolutionary existence [Prawdin, 1961, 48-9]. More recently GA's Stephen Booth portrays a 'utopian' society in City Death.¹¹ Booth's plan can act as the basis for measuring contemporary society's shortcomings by comparison with the suggested utopia. It also provides a gauge for assessing the success of current methods by considering if current strategies are helping to reach the millennial community.

Recent utopian studies has suggested re-evaluating imaginative idealised societies by considering them as performing more sophisticated functions than just as blueprints [Sargisson, 1996, 87]. Utopias can illustrate anarchist principles, with a presentation of how they might work in practice. They can also act as a source of inspiration and an alternative discourse for political ideas, or as an impetus for action. Their function could be akin to Sorel's myths, for example Richard Humphrey argues that there are distinctions between myths and utopias as the former are irrational and unaffected by the failure to be realised [Humphrey, 1951, 171-3]. Contemporary anarchist utopias work, however, precisely because of their mythic qualities. Neither the xenophobia of Booth's utopian community, nor the unrealistic ease in which divisions of gender, race and sexuality are overcome in Breaking Free detract from the role these utopias play in symbolically portraying anarchist principles and dealing in fictional forms with problems which affect anarchism.¹² Anarchist utopias are not end points which direct action but fulfil other multiple roles. They demonstrate and play with tactical methods, encourage and inspire readers, provide a literary form for presenting critiques of current proposed practices as well as provide a form of pleasurable escape.

Free and Daniel's Breaking Free (the latter published by Attack International) follow the narrative themes of Emile Pautaud' & Emile Poget's How Shall We Bring About The Revolution in presenting accounts of ideal forms of social change.

Utopianism as a blueprint is rejected not just because so many proposed perfect societies are distasteful, such as Booth's and Nechaev's, but because it involves a general imposition on the whole of humanity of the creation of just a few minds. This runs counter to the ideal of anarchism whereby the oppressed themselves must take priority in formulating and producing their own patterns of living. Totalising philosophies of the modernist era, such as Leninism, in which eventual ends are scientifically determined, have been superseded by post-structuralist theories that replace large scale meta-narratives with the liberating possibilities of multiplicity. Ideal type anarchism reject a singular totalising end point and the concomitant manipulation of individuals to fit a predetermined schema; it therefore engages more productively than Leninism with postmodernism [Harvey, 1996, 9, 14 & 43].¹³

The traditional alternative to the consequentialist approach has been deontological ethics. Some anarchists, especially those in the liberal anarchist tradition, have explicitly used this form of moral evaluation. However, this too is incompatible with class struggle anarchism's prefigurative ethic.

4. Deontology

The attractions of Kantian ethics (deontology) for anarchists are not hard to detect. Kant sought a rational basis for ethics that would eradicate dependence on a metaphysical ground and would free morality from religious control. Reason is the essential faculty for Kant as through its use individuals can overcome their instincts and choose for themselves. This notion of the autonomous agent is shared by liberal anarchists [Baldelli, 1971, 19].¹⁴ It represents the ability of the individual to make choices. This individual 'will', the autonomous agency, is 'the highest good and the condition of all others' [Kant, 1959, 12].

For Kant, autonomy is of central importance; what makes an act susceptible to moral consideration is that it is voluntary. If an act is impelled by instinctive responses or by the imposition of particular ends, then the moral agent has no sovereignty. So ends cannot be imposed, choices of action must, for Kant, be free. The guarantor for autonomy in choosing between possible alternatives is the use of reason [Kant, 1959, 17 & 21]. Kant calls 'imperatives' those ethical principles that instruct particular behaviours [Kant, 1959, 30]. These imperatives are of two types. Hypothetical imperatives are driven by particular ends, for instance 'for a healthy life one ought to refrain from smoking'. This is goal driven. The second type of imperative is categorical, is 'without having any other end' [Kant, 1959, 32]. An example of a non-consequential duty would be 'never break a promise'. The categorical imperative provides the basis of Kantian morality.

Categorical imperatives are the most important because they are not end dependent they are unchanging and universal. Categorical imperatives are derived by the use of reason and are valid for all rational people. It transpires that all categorical imperatives can be reduced to a single one, namely: Act only according to that maxim by which you can at the same time will that it should become a universal law' [Kant, 1959, 39].¹⁵ For the act to be justified the general principle, of which it is an example, must be universally applicable.

¹⁵ For a discussion of whether there is just one categorical imperative see Beauchamp & Childress, 1989, 38-9

The aspect of the categorical imperative picked up on by many anarchists, is the notion of autonomy. The anarchist ideal criticises Kantian notions of autonomy (the self-governing agent) but does not advocate heteronomy (the imposition of external rules or constraints) in its place. Autonomy is an important feature of the anarchist prefigurative ethic, but unlike Kant, consistent class struggle anarchists formulate it in an anti-essentialist, rather than an individualised sense (see below). Kant formulates sovereignty in terms of treating people as ends in themselves, rather than solely as means. Limits are placed upon each individual restraining them from infringing on the autonomy of others, guided by the categorical imperative. Through the application of absolutely binding moral duties, one is obliged to carry out an act regardless of its consequences. The most famous example is where a Kantian moral actor is ethically impelled to return a borrowed axe to a homicidal neighbour in order to keep a promise to return property. Not to do so would be to break a pledge. There is a categorical imperative, according to Kant, to maintain one's word because if everyone broke a promise, then promises would become meaningless.

There are a number of apparent attractions of deontology for anarchists from both class struggle and individualist traditions. The features that seem most advantageous are those that avoid the excesses of consequentialism, namely, respect for each subject's ability to make rational choices and the obligation to avoid treating people as means to an end. The provision of a rational framework with guarantees for sovereignty without recourse to metaphysical authorities, made Kantianism appealing to many under the anarchist banner, especially (but not exclusively) those from liberal, egoistic and anarcho-capitalist strands.¹⁶

4.1. Deontology and Contractual Relationships

Despite the many apparent hierarchical characteristics and repercussions of deontology, many described as 'anarchists' have embraced Kantianism, at least in part. Liberal humanist anarchists such as Baldelli have embraced one interpretation of the categorical imperative, while anarcho-capitalists have endorsed the notion of sovereignty within a liberal economic framework. Both these positions are incompatible with the ideal form of prefigurative anarchism.

4.1.1. Anarcho-Capitalism and Liberal Anarchism

Anarcho-capitalists such as Hayek maintain that advocacy of ends is necessarily authoritarian. Hayek's condemnation is overtly Kantian: to reach the selected goal involves restricting the autonomy of the individual to freely choose [Hayek, 1973, 35-54]. Consequentialism therefore imposes the pre-determined will of others onto sovereign individuals. According to Hayek determining ends is impossible as the individual's ambitions alter in response to other people's autonomous behaviour. Anarcho-capitalists by contrast prioritise means; rational sovereign agents making free contracts to achieve their ambitions, whatever form they take.

Anarcho-capitalists endorse 'voluntary' contractual agreements as the basis for social relationships. Free-marketeers share with Kant the belief that autonomous individuals have the right to determine their own ends and to do so through free contract. In the words of anarcho-capitalist Chris Cooper: 'freedom means nothing if it does not mean the freedom to make mutually beneficial exchanges with others' [Cooper, 1989e, 1]. Individualists, like Ludwig von Mises, consider sovereignty of the individual is assured through market relationships:

¹⁶ See for instance Wolff, 1976, 12-14 & 72

'There is in the operation of the market no compulsion and coercion' [von Mises, 1949, 258]. Individual contracts enforced by privatised legal practices are considered the ideal model for social interaction. Proudhon too advocated a society run entirely on the basis of free contract [Hyams, 179, 186-7]. This position is endorsed by the liberal anarchist tradition, represented by the Canadian writer Robert Graham. He claims that contractual obligations are only wrong in capitalist society because they are not made between equals. They would, however, be admissible as the basis of exchange in a liberal anarchist society [Graham, 1996, 71].

Class struggle anarchists advance a number of criticisms of this free-market application of deontology. Contractual duties are based on the intention to maintain a promise, regardless of how the resultant situation may differ from the intention behind the duty. In the example used earlier in which a person is obliged to return the axe to his/her homicidal neighbour, the ethic is dependent on the distinction between foreseeability and intentionality. The moral agent had no desire to assist in the murder of his/her neighbour's family, yet this was the foreseeable result of returning the borrowed axe. The distinction between the possible likely results and the desired consequences is important but an unequivocal moral separation between the two, as Kantianism requires, is difficult to preserve without offering a view of the individual as abstracted from social networks. Extreme individualists may offer such a defence, but even some liberal critics recognise the moral concept of negligence. The person returning the axe to his neighbour is guilty of just that. Class struggle anarchists by contrast accept that individuals are constitutive parts of wider social networks. To deny significance to the likely results of one's actions in order to perform a duty appears at odds with a benevolent moral philosophy, and would be a principle incapable of being universalised.

4.1.2. Free Contracts

Class struggle anarchists dispute the efficacy of contracts, as they still imply heteronomous obligation. If the activities are mutually beneficial the question arises as to why agreements have to be enforced, or why are formalised agreements needed at all? Contracts in a free-market are rarely between equal partners and exacerbate inequalities. In order to meet their basic needs, the least powerful are often compelled into agreements that further restrict their liberty. More socially-minded anarchists, such as Most, have promoted a different view of a 'free contract' in which people can withdraw from contracts at any point without financial penalty. Such free contracts certainly avoid the problems of freezing social relations by having as their basis predetermined agreements, regardless of changing circumstance. But there are shortcomings with Most's suggestion. He still includes a mild sanction through loss of reputation for those who do not keep the contract [Trautmann, 1980, 110]. Contracts indicate that one act has a value with respect to another. As Alain Pengam explained even the liberal view of contract necessitates someone being in credit or debit (the latter being open to light sanction) [Pengam, 1987, 72]. Communism, the autonomous composition of new types of living, rejects any recreation of the law of value. As Berkman explains non-hierarchical social relations require only 'concord and co-operation' whereas contracts require an apparatus of enforcement. Such heteronomous interventions are only necessary when social structures are already repressive and are not a solution to such forms of domination [Berkman, 1987, 64 & 69].

4.2. Liberal Anarchist Deontology

Anarchists of all denominations recognise that universalisability provides a strong heuristic device for choosing between acts, as Kropotkin recognised:

Besides this principle of treating others as one wishes to be treated, what is it but the very same principle as equality, the fundamental principle of anarchism? And how can anyone manage to believe himself an anarchist unless he practices it? [Kropotkin, 1970, 98].

As Kropotkin indicates, it is not just the anarcho-capitalists who were influenced by Kantian philosophy, although Kropotkin felt there were significant weaknesses with the theory.¹⁷ The shortcomings we will concentrate upon are its universal and abstract individualised moral agent.

In liberal anarchism, exemplified by Baldelli, the agent of change is that predicated by Kantian ethics, the dispassionate, objective citizen, abstract 'Man' [Baldelli, 1972, 74]. For Kant, abstract individuals agree to give up freedoms for the rights of living under civil law. A prerequisite for this social contract is the equal opportunity to influence legislation [Kant, 1959, 73]. What is at question for individualists is that no such contract has been made.¹⁸ The criticisms by class struggle anarchists are twofold. Firstly the model of the equal citizen with equivalence of opportunity to change the law does not exist when hierarchies of power are in place, such as in capitalist society [Class War, 1992, 44 & 47; Kropotkin, 1972, 48-9]. Secondly, and of more importance, is the atomised individualist identity of the Kantian and anarchocapitalist moral agents. May, amongst others, recognises an essentialism within classical anarchism in which there is a fixed, benign human nature which forms the core of the individual actor [May, 1994, 63].¹⁹ Dependence on this benevolent metaphysical (and therefore fundamentally unknowable) construct hampers rather than encourages moral evaluation. It suggests a universal actor independent of context or circumstance. Arguments predicated on a humanist essentialism restrict action to opposing power in order to allow the expression of 'natural goodness'. Essentialism stands opposed to theories (often regarded as post-structuralist) that propose that other forms of power can construct non-hierarchical social relations and identities. Ideal type anarchism is, in this sense, post-structural, as it recognises the fluidity of subject identities and rejects a singular essential human nature.

Melucci discusses the paucity of individualist methodologies for ethical analysis. To be comprehensible collective action must involve the use of general categories such as 'solidarity', in which collective identities are assumed and mutually recognised amongst the participants [Melucci, 1996, 23]. These explanatory classifications are irreducible to statements concerning individuals. Class struggle anarchists maintain the importance of autonomy but accept that this will often take a collective as well as individual form. Group decision making in deciding upon suitable means and ends for carrying such action is a rejection of the imposition of ultimate objectives and predetermined instrumental methods onto subject groups. It resists the reduction of agents to mere tools [Class War, 1992, 125-6]. Chapter Four examines collective decision-making methods within anarchist groupings.

¹⁹ See for instance Morland, 1997, 3 & Call, 1999, 100

4.3. Anarchism Against Deontology

In ideal anarchism, the liberatory act is defined by the ability of oppressed agents to create new social structures that avoid hierarchy and representation. In creating their own social relations in contrast to those of oppressive power (a process called self-valorization by autonomist marxists) the subjugated class creates new types of practices and seeks out new forms of solidarity [Dauvé, 1997a, 17 & 36]. The agents of change contest the inequalities in social power and seek their equalisation. 'Social power' a term discussed in greater detail in the next chapter, refers to the amount of autonomy agents have in formulating and acting upon their goals and how much influence they have on creating the realities of others. Low social power, in a given context, refers to a predominant order-taker role, high social power to an order-giver [Cardan, 1975e, 5-7]. Countervailing methods aim to create alternative non-hierarchical social relations and these tactics are particular to specific domineering disciplines.

The importance of the appropriate agent in anarchist prefiguration cannot be over-stressed. Other groups, such as racist organisations, argue that their actions are guided by prefigurative considerations. Attacking individual members of minority groups, they might suggest, is indicative of their wider (anti-)social ambitions.²⁰ In this way racist means prefigure the wider repressive political programme. But their methods are antithetical to the egalitarian principles of anarchism, as power-relations remain fundamentally imbalanced, and appeal to a different agent or set of agents than that promoted by class struggle anarchism. The appropriate agent which British anarchism aspires to influence is discussed in the next chapter. However, in short, the appropriate agents for change are those who are subjected to power, individuals placed in unprivileged positions within a given social context, that is to say with low social power. The prefigurative act, as used by anarchists, aims to resist this oppression.

Prefigurative ethics collapses the problematic distinction between means and ends. It requires appropriate agents of change who act autonomously to end their own oppression. Such methods are pragmatic and local as no ultimate ethical ground exists. The practicality associated with anarchist methods of creating immediate results indicates that anarchism is constantly suspicious of mediation and the dangers of means becoming ends. Anarchist acts aim at a useful result (that is one that allows for greater autonomy albeit maybe only temporarily), reducing the gap between foreseeability and intentionality, but immediate goals are not the sole grounds for assessment. The local agent determines the pertinence of the event. This is the model of direct action found in a great deal of contemporary libertarian propaganda.

Anarchism's prefigurative, pragmatic approach is in contrast to instrumentalist strategies that appeal to the ultimate millennial events such as 'the revolution'. Either the revolution never occurs thereby providing no possible basis for distinguishing between methods, or the successful uprising turns into dictatorship negating the very methods that had early been central to the emancipatory strategy. For the contemporary anarchist-ideal tactics embody the forms of social relation that the actors wish to see develop. They are contextual and require the oppressed themselves having a primary role in eradicating subjugating conditions. As methods mirror the end, radical behaviour evokes the playful and the carnivalesque, attempting to dissolve divisions particular to specific forms of oppressive power, such as those

PART II

Direct Action

Introduction

Direct action has long been identified with anarchism, an association that stretches back to the nineteenth century syndicalists [Carter, 1973, 137].²¹ The term, despite the many misinterpretations, is widely applied to anarchist behaviours because direct action refers to practical prefigurative activity carried out by subjugated groups in order to lessen or vanquish their oppression. Further complications occur because some within the wider anarchist tradition (predominantly liberal anarchists) suggest that only non-violent direct action is consistent with anarchist prefiguration. Examining the differences between direct action and other forms of (anti-)political approaches illustrates both the appropriateness of this form of activity for anarchism and the unsuitability of alternative methods such as symbolic or constitutional action. It also reveals the importance of the appropriate agent. As a result, unlike civil disobedience, which by definition is non-violent, direct action may take forms which opponents may consider physically coercive.

Anarchists take great pride in their association with direct action. During the First World War Freedom declared that the best tactics for revolutionary activity were 'appeals to reason and ²¹ The connection between anarchists and direct action was recognised by the Economic League (EL), a privately funded surveillance body responsible for politically vetting existing and potential employees. EL categorised disparate groups, anarcho-syndicalists, animal liberationists and libertarian-communists as 'anarchists' on the basis that all described their preferred tactics with the identical phrase [Economic League, 1986, 50-2; Economic League, 1991b, 14]. The Economic League is now defunct [The Guardian 28.7.90].

direct action' [Freedom, June 1917, 27]. The strength of the association for anarchism was such that the anarcho-syndicalist SolFed called itself the Direct Action Movement (DAM) from 1979 to 1994, and continues to call their magazine Direct Action (fig. 2.1.).²²

Although different anarchist groups use the same terminology, it does not mean that they are organisationally linked, have similar ideals or interpret key phrases in identical ways. SolFed, for instance, concentrate on the industrial front as the main arena for revolutionary activity and when talking of 'direct action' refers to strike action, workplace occupation and sabotage on the industrial front. The Animal Liberation Front (ALF), in contrast, regards the exploitation of animals to be the primary site of struggle. In using the term 'direct action' the latter refers to attacks on laboratories where vivisection takes place and vandalism of shops engaging in unethical enterprise.

All the above groups recognise 'direct action' as involving a threat to oppression, yet the forms of oppression and the types of behaviour aimed at its overthrow, leave the term open to multifarious interpretations placed. Such diversity is reflected in the differing accounts of the subject from academics. April Carter, for instance, defines direct action in a number of competing ways. In an overtly propagandist piece for CND, Direct Action, she contrasted it primarily with constitutional and symbolic action [Carter, 1983],²³ which reflects the manner in which anarchists have sought to justify their approval for prefigurative (anti-)political behaviour.²⁴ In a later analysis Direct Action and Liberal Democracy, Carter describes direct action as a form of behaviour which can be consistent with the previously oppositional categories of constitutional and symbolic action.

5. Direct Action: Means and Ends

As Carter recognises, the term 'direct action' is highly ambiguous [Carter, 1973, 3]. It has been indiscriminately applied to behaviour more properly identified as civil disobedience. The two differ in numerous ways not least in the differing commitments to non-violence, law breaking and prefiguration. As a result of journalistic misappropriation, the term 'direct action' has become almost meaningless.²⁵

Carter's attempt at clarification in order to resurrect this term as a meaningful category of political behaviour is, however, unsatisfactory. Her method is to reject definition 'in terms of method, goal or of the persons using it' as being 'sterile and misleading' [Carter, 1973, 3]. In its place she suggests that the best way of 'understanding [...] what is entailed in the idea of direct action is to consider which movements have consciously used direct action, and what theoretical connotations surround their use of the phrase' [Carter, 1973, 3].

Action Against All Bloodsports.

²⁴ See for instance Class War No. 52, 8-9 on constitutional versus direct action.

²⁵ The BBC television programme 'Heart of the Matter' [BBC1, 23.3.97 23:10 - 00:00] is a case in point. It included a film by Merrick Goodhaven and a panel discussion in which 'direct action' and 'civil disobedience' were used interchangeably.

While not denying the importance of looking at its use and the ideological orientation of those exponents who use it, Carter's methodology is question-begging. It requires a prior conception of direct action in order to determine the scope of the search and to identify which groups of people are using it.

Direct action is in fact best understood using the criteria which Carter uses in the earlier essay, where she distinguishes between different types of action precisely on the grounds of the means employed, ends desired and the agents involved. These categories can be used to illustrate the tripartite division between constitutional, symbolic and direct action, under which most political behaviour falls. Direct action competes with symbolic and especially constitutional enterprise, and the specific features of the first can be assessed through contrast with the latter two. These categories of analysis also help elucidate the debate surrounding direct action, those concerning the role of theory, and the importance of agency. They also clarify the debate surrounding prefiguration and violence, which has long been regarded as one of the most contentious within anarchism.

Direct action is prefigurative in that the means adopted to achieve objectives are characteristic of the ends with the oppressed acting against their subjugation. Direct action resists mediation. For example, in dealing with homelessness and inadequate housing, two counter proposals have been adopted for its resolution. The first would be to encourage the homeless to squat in empty buildings. This, as Carter and contemporary anarchists agree, is direct action [Carter, 1973, 17]. The alternative is to lobby parliament to raise the matter of inadequate housing in the legislature. This is not direct action as the campaign itself does not practically resolve the social problem, nor are the primary agents of change - parliamentarians - the ones directly affected by the housing shortage. Constitutional acts are separate forms of behaviour [Carter, 1983, 3-4 & 22]. Direct action is prefigurative, what is desired must also be involved in reaching this aim [Carter, 1973, 19].²⁶

Direct action is synecdochic. It stands both as a practical response to a given situation, but also as a symbol of the larger vision of societal change. For anarchists, direct action involves equalising power relations and altering relations of production and exchange, as this is part of their envisioned aim. As such direct action is part of a wider (anti-)political strategy. Involving a 'conscious will to resist or to affect policy' [Carter, 1973, 25]. It is both particular and general. Anarchist direct action alleviates specific hardships consistent with the general principles of libertarianism.

The identities of the agents involved in direct action is one of the necessary - but not sufficient - characteristics of anarchist direct action that demarcates it from its non-anarchist variants, and distinguishes direct action from paternalistic behaviour. In anarchist direct action the agents are those directly affected by the problem under consideration. Other forms of direct action promote benevolent (and sometimes malevolent) paternalism. In 1976-7 senior politicians, including Shirley Williams, joined the picket lines of strikers at Grunwick, and Neil Kinnock joined the striking miners' picket-lines (1984-5); yet these are not examples of acceptable direct action from these individuals as they were not directly affected. Anarchists claim that the involvement of politicians is an instrument to their gaining electoral power and political privilege, so the parliamentarians' activities are not prefigurative. Yet, these same acts constitute direct action - consistent with anarchism - when they are carried out by the Grunwick-employees and colliers or others affected by the result of the dispute.

In their ideal form anarchists do not consider their role as pivotal. It does not require a class of 'community politicians' or self-identified activists to carry out these acts. Anarchism does not require anarchists, indeed as the Situationists argued the creation of 'specialists in freedom' creates new hierarchies and divisions [Debord, 1983, para 93]. The core of anarchism is that the oppressed themselves carry out their own liberation. This is not to say that some anarchists do consider themselves as forming a separate vanguard group, but in doing so they conflict with their own prefigurative ethic.²⁷

5.1. Direct Action and Agency

Carter provides plenty of examples of anarchist direct action: prisoners leading strikes against their conditions, workers occupying factories to save them from closure or as part of pay negotiations, black citizens boycotting buses which promote racial segregation [Carter, 1973, 19 & 6-7]. There are however occasions when some have used the term 'direct action' in an improper fashion. For instance animal rights activists are not behaving in a liberatory manner if their aim is animal liberation.

[L]ike the IRA learned in the seventies, there must be a separation between the political wing and the military wing which led to the birth of Sinn Fein. Of course we all know there is overlap but our spokespeople must not jeopardise their liberty [Class War No. 78, 9].

The actions of ALF and others are on the contrary not the actions of one group struggling for its own interests. Unfortunately, animals are unable to do this. As such they have no 'rights'. What animals have are the actions of altruistically minded humans who object to the way animals are treated. [Subversion No. 9, 6]

Subversion, like many other class struggle libertarian groups regard ALF-style activity as non-anarchist direct action, as it is not carried out by the oppressed person (or group). If the same ALF-style actions were carried out against oligarchical agribusinesses by dissatisfied employees, consumers angry at the paucity and expense (both monetarily and environmentally) of the food offered and those whose livelihoods are placed under threat by the expansion of technologically-dominant modes of production, this would constitute direct action of an anarchistic variety.

The aim of engaging those directly affected by oppression may lead to a concentration on campaigns surrounding local issues, as Trevor Smith, a commentator on radical action from the early 1970s, reports.

[T]he need [is] to encourage individual participation... [T]o do this, issues must be selected which are close at hand. The world has become too complex for any individual to cultivate his own macro-cosmic view of it which might guide his actions and possibly those of others; the only solution is to avoid such lofty considerations and concentrate one's energies instead at a level of society and within a range of issues which one can fully comprehend. [Smith, 1972, 310]

The notion of agency is clarified later on to include an international subject (that of a multi-identified working class) allowing the types of issue to stretch beyond the merely parochial. Yet Smith is right to identify the decentralised nature of anarchist assaults. 'Think global - Act local' has long been a slogan for anarchist-environmentalist, syndicalist and communist alike, it has almost become a cliché.²⁸ When local actions or micropolitics are undertaken, conceptions of the agents of change, their motivations and the forms of organisation are shown to be different to those posited by the grander Leninist traditions. Orthodox marxists propose a unified working class homogenised into a single organisational structure, while the anarchist ideal acknowledges multiple structures as being both desirable and necessary to a shifting and diverse anarchist revolutionary agent of change.

5.2. Practicality and Direct Action

Anarchists propose direct action as a pragmatic response to the social problems they identify. There have been a significant number of do-it-yourself protest movements around environmental and civil liberties issues throughout the 1990s and into the new millennium. The participatory approach, evident in punk subcultures, was overtly championed by the ecological activists in events such as the land occupations in Wandsworth (Pure Genius site), Wanstead, Pollock and Newbury. These unmediated experiments involved significant numbers of libertarians and have been represented as anarchic moments [McKay, 1996].

Given the association of anarchism with utopianism

and impossiblism, the importance of practical responses may seem surprising. In discussing the different anarchist approaches to reform and minor immediate change, in a later chapter, the point will be made that such alterations are welcomed by most anarchists when they enhance the power of the revolutionary agency at the expense of the countervailing power (however defined).²⁹ Yet some anarchist groups reject all reforms as inadequate seeing them as restraints on the revolutionary potential of the oppressed. Anarchist objectives sometimes appear to be distant and unrealisable even in the lifetimes of current activists [Chan, 1995, 52-3]. Demonstrably useful ventures encourage activists and promote support, as the celebrations surrounding the abolition of the Poll Tax demonstrate [Class War No. 46, 4; Burns, 1992, 177]. Only in its millennial instance does anarchist direct action achieve its ultimate goal, often couched in terms of social revolution.³⁰

The practical consequences of direct action are not limited to immediate small improvements in conditions. A reform may not occur as a result of a single direct act, but as part of an on-going campaign. The road protestors did not expect that the invasion of a single bye-pass construction camp would alter governmental policy immediately, but that change would come through a continuous crusade, and that the experience itself would be an example of libertarian enrichment.³¹ The distinction between short term and long term for prefigurative acts is insignificant except in terms of size. Short term aims are more localised, longer term objectives are the progressive culmination of short term acts. Even when localised direct acts do not meet their immediate ends, the prefigurative features mean that the participants have benefited from the involvement. They have gained not only an insight into the type of promised future society, but also developed practical competencies, whether in developing craft-skills or organisational and communicative faculties [Burns, 1992, 190-202]. Micropolitical acts are unmediated being controlled by those affected. As suggested above, this stands in contrast to other political methods, symbolic and constitutional action.

³⁰ See for instance DAM, 1984, 8.

6. Constitutional Proceedings Versus Direct Action

Macro-politics takes place on the scale of control and influence of the state.³²

Constitutional action aims to sway the legislature or judiciary through legal means such as organising and signing petitions, lobbies of parliament, local councils or other legislative bodies. As Marcuse points out, such action confirms the legitimacy of the state as it accepts that the institutions and individuals in charge are amenable to change and that the existing constitutional systems are adequate and representative [Marcuse, 1969, 98]. Anarchists ³² 'State' is used to mean the final arbiter in the use of force in a particular geographical region and the institutions that operate to ensure its legitimacy and enact its commands. These are the judiciary, legislative, executive, constitutional arrangements and the formal and informal rules that operate between and within these bodies. It also includes the conventions (covert and overt) which mediate between these institutions and the social realm.

Although many anarchist like Bakunin, grudgingly admit that liberal democracy is less pernicious than overt tyranny, they reject participation in constitutional processes [Bakunin, 1953, 221]. Historically, anarchists have been opposed to parliamentary government because of its oppressive, elitism. Anarchists today continue to be equally as antagonistic, one of the activities that unites anarchists in Britain is participation in Anti-Election activities [fig. 2.2].³³ Indeed, as Lenin points out, the rejection of parliamentarianism has been so strongly associated with anarchism that it is often mistaken for anarchism [Lenin, 1976, 55].³⁴ The rejection of parliamentarianism was the foundation of a profound split in the communist movement in the aftermath of the October Revolution. Lenin's Left-Wing Communism: An Infantile Disorder was a response to critics in Germany (Herman Gorter), Netherlands (Anton Pannekoek), Italy (Amadeo Bordiga) and Britain (Sylvia Pankhurst) of the Bolsheviks' parliamentary tactics. This led to the formation of a small communist current opposed to Leninism, identifiable with class struggle anarchism [Dauvé & Martin, 1997, 79].

³³ The Anti-Election Alliance is an umbrella grouping' largely energised by the Class War Federation [.....]. Those backing the [1992 Anti-Elections] rally are London Greenpeace, the Anarchist Communist Federation, the Direct Action Movement, the 121 Centre, the Anarchist Black Cross & Affiliates and Harringey Solidarity Group' [Hutchings, 1992, 14].

Anarchists' reasons for rejecting legalistic methods differ amongst the various tendencies. For the extreme individualists such as Stirner, government by will of the majority is no less an infringement on the individual than that of monarchical tyranny [Stirner, 1993, 108-9]. For class struggle anarchists, representative democracy is rejected on three grounds. These criticisms are based on a pragmatic assessment of electoral methods with respect to anarchist principles (including prefiguration). These counter-constitutional positions have become so accepted that they have gained, within parts of class struggle anarchism, the status of a priori truths. The desire for practical but still principled responses, however, has led to some questioning of these positions, an area which will be discussed in the final chapter.³⁵ The positions that reject constitutional activity are as follows:

1. Representative democracy involves voters relinquishing their own powers and giving them to others to exercise on their behalf.
2. Liberal democracy creates a political class whose interests are not the same as their electors.
3. Under capitalism, the executive and legislature is not where power is really found, (but is a servant of the interests of capital), and so constitutional activity is misdirected.

These arguments refute constitutional methods as incompatible with class struggle libertarianism. For contemporary British anarchism the agents involved have to be the oppressed, the power-relations that the method employs must conform to egalitarian and libertarian principles, and the sites of conflict identified have to be immediate. Constitutional methods fail on all three grounds

6.1. Abdication of Power

The first of the above criticisms by anarchists is that representative democracy, by definition, creates a group of people with more power than those who elected them. As Robert Chaase an American situationist explained: 'Bourgeois [representative] democracy is the appropriation of the political power of individuals, renamed constituencies, by representatives' [Situationist International, No. 1, para. 16]. Voters give up their political power to others who exercise it on their behalf. This behaviour is out of keeping with the egalitarian aims of anarchism. As the ACF point by 'ceding political power to someone or some party' those they yield to will inevitably have different interests [ACF, 1997e, 2]. Consequently the constitutional response, of abdicating responsibility to another has to be rejected. Direct action, by contrast, increases the power of the revolutionary class, even if the act is not immediately successful.

The presupposition from the anarchists is that representative democracy, pace Jean-Jacques Rousseau, is a form of feudalism for it assumes that citizens cannot represent themselves and require others to do so [Rousseau, 1983, 240]. By passing on authority to others, Rousseau explains, citizens enslave themselves to a new set of masters. 'The moment a people allows itself to be represented, it is no longer free...' [Rousseau, 1983, 242]. For Rousseau the subjugation of individuals is an unavoidably consequence of representative democracy not found in more direct forms. Many anarchists show a deep attachment to Rousseau. The Primitivists, in particular, share his preference for amour de soi over amour-propre and his critique of civilisation, without accepting Rousseau's corresponding rejection of returning to a pre-social state. Yet, for other anarchists, this criticism of representative democracy is more contingent than necessary, built upon countless examples of representative democracy replacing direct democracy which then developed into a further lowering of the status of the electorate.³⁶

Advocates of representative government reject these criticisms. Thomas Paine maintains that representative democracy provides for all relevant interests to have an influence without the inconvenience of direct democracy. Representative democracy is far more efficient for large populations [Paine, 1983, 199-202]. For other liberal theorists such as John Locke, democratic government, whether as a Greek popular legislative assembly, elective oligarchy or constitutional monarchy, provides a bulwark against the development of a more powerful class. Governments serve by the approval of the citizens and hence are the servants of the people, charged with protecting their rights. For Locke these rights involve the protection of the individual's 'life, liberty and property' (a slogan taken up as the slogan of the anarcho-capitalist Libertarian Alliance). In the final instance power remains with the electorate, such that if the administration loses the trust of the people then the people have the right to alter it. Abuses of power lead the people to scrutinize the role of government and provoke appropriate responses including open revolt [Locke, 1993, 343].

Anarchists in reply make three related observations. Firstly, even in idealistic, egalitarian movements, representatives can assume hierarchical powers, through their exclusive experience of exercising decision-making power they gain unequalled knowledge. As a result, these representatives coalesce into a new class who gain acceptance because the electorate have no opportunity to assess the suitability of their decisions [Virus, No. 1, 8]. While class struggle anarchists accept that governments exist to protect individual private property rights, they consider this to be neither desirable nor legitimate. In protecting these rights governments become weighted towards the interests of the mightiest [Parry, 1978, 128].

Secondly, a government that abuses power to become master of the destiny of others does not, in most Western democratic nations, advertise the fact through the open use of coercion predicted by Locke. Instead governments ensure compliance through, to quote the American libertarian Naom Chomsky, the 'manufacture of consent' [Chomsky, 1986]. The effect is to hide rather than display abuse and to manipulate acceptance. The task of overthrowing inegalitarian constitutional government is hindered by its guise of equality and democracy.

Thirdly, anarchists recognise that representative forms of government are sometimes required for certain limited forms of organisation where factors, such as the geographical size of the enterprise, make direct participation impractical. In examples such as these, they propose a number of modifications to representative organisations to prevent the creation of a governing class. These will be discussed in Chapter Four. To touch on them briefly, they include a restriction on the number and duration of full-time posts, prohibition on the right to stand for consecutive elective positions and the right to immediately recall delegates [Virus, No. 11, 14-5]. Stress too is placed on autonomous activity for groups and individuals within an organisation, direct democracy and federal, rather than centralised structures. Many associated with the Green Anarchist Movement regard these additions as inadequate. They maintain, like Rousseau, that all representative methods necessarily reduce the electorate to serfs. They argue that only small scale, localised movements are acceptable and regard all forms of mass organisation as totalitarian.³⁷

6.2. Creating New Masters

Tom Paine defined many of the advantages of democratic government over monarchy. These compensations include the idea that the commoner would have relevant knowledge of the needs and abilities of the general public, whereas a hereditary leader would not [Paine, 1953, 8 & 31-2]. Yet the dynamics of representative democracy create a new dominant class. The functionaries gain their authority from the voters. These officials act in a mediating role between the voters and the fulfilment of the voters' desires. The elected, however, become a privileged class, according to class struggle anarchists, who implicitly, and explicitly, develop the Hegelian notion of the mediator becomes dominant [Hegel, 1987, 271-2 & Hegel, 1977, 118]. As Bakunin explains, the representatives have more social power, different social experiences of work and higher levels of respect than their electorate and consequently have different interests. 'On the one side there is the feeling of superiority necessarily inspired by a superior position; on the other there is the feeling of inferiority induced by the attitude of superiority on the part of the teacher exercising executive or legislative power' [Bakunin, 1953, 218]. As the Irish anarchist J R White put it: 'Don't ask them [the workers] to saddle themselves with political masters, who the day after they conquer state power will want, like all conquerors, to remain the masters' [White, 1998, 4].

³⁷ See too Anti-Mass: Methods of Organisation for Collectives, 1988 & Christie, 1983e

This social distinction occurs even if the elected representative comes from the same social class as its constituency. Bakunin asks what would occur if working class deputies, for all their financial disadvantages, succeed in being elected? He concludes that the class origins would make no difference.

[D]o you know what will be the result? The inevitable result will be that workers' deputies, transferred to a purely bourgeois environment and into an atmosphere of purely bourgeois ideas, ceasing in fact to be workers and becoming statesmen instead, will become middle class in their outlook, perhaps even more so than the bourgeois themselves [Bakunin, 1953, 216].³⁸

The division between governor and governed in representative democracy, heightened by the desire for those in charge not to have an inquisitive electorate overseeing them, means that the populace are kept ignorant. The masses are therefore less capable of controlling their political masters and, consequently, their own destinies [Bakunin, 1953, 219]. Participating in representative democracy does not fundamentally alter the unequal relations of social power and in some circumstances actually exacerbates them. By contrast, direct action breaks down the distinctions between leaders and followers in order to equalise power-relations

³⁸ A point repeated by the ACF that the class interests and concerns of representatives alter once they gain elective power such that working class MPs inevitably lose touch with their communities [ACF, 1997e, 2]. See too Subversion who approvingly reports Sylvia Pankhurst's comments: 'Women can no more put virtue into the decaying parliamentary institution than men: it is past reform and must disappear....' [Q. Pankhurst, Subversion No. 9, 8].

6.3. Misdirected Sites of Power

The most trenchant criticism of encouraging change through constitutional elective activity is that power does not really reside in the hands of governments. This claim is often summed up in the phrase: 'if voting changed anything... It would be illegal' [headline of Workers Solidarity, Number 51, Summer 1997, 1]. The reasoning behind such a blanket condemnation of the franchise is explained by Britain's Class War:

The British State is supposed to be controlled by the politicians and the politicians elected by us. This, we are told, allows us through the ballot box to change things. So why does the State act in the interests of the ruling class regardless of whoever is in power - Labour, Tory or Liberal? It is because to function and succeed politicians and their parties are ultimately controlled by the capitalists and the State's own permanent unelected officials [Class War, 1992, 45].

The owners and controllers of a country's wealth, the senior officials in the civil service, the judiciary and the armed forces are considered by anarchists to be the real organisers of social life. Changing the personnel in Augustus Pugin & Charles Barry's Palace of Westminster cannot dismantle the structural power imbalances of Western countries.

This recognition that the elected offices of the state do not have determining control of social relations is shared with Leninists. Anarchists distinguish themselves from the Leninist perspective by rejecting a strictly instrumentalist view of national bureaucratic structures. Orthodox marxists have argued that the state is a commission of the dominant class.

The bourgeoisie has at last, since the establishment of Modern Industry and of the world market, conquered for itself, in the modern representative State, exclusive political sway. The executive of the modern state is but a committee for managing the common affairs of the whole bourgeoisie [Marx & Engels, 1977, 37-8].

Alan Carter explains how the anarchist analysis of the state, developed from Bakunin, differs from orthodox marxism. The executive as an instrument of the bourgeoisie is shown to subsequently gain relative autonomy. The interests of the state are no longer identical with the class it serves, its primary interest being to protect itself. The interests of these two groups can (and do) frequently correspond, but they can also conflict. Where taxes are levied to pay for the operation of a state, for example, these interests may cause opposition amongst the entrepreneurial middle classes [Carter, 1989, 183-4].³⁹ Attacking the bourgeois may not therefore fundamentally alter the state, or vice-versa.

In other words, the state might transform the mode of production because it is in its interests to do so. But new relations of production which promised a greater surplus to the state would not be egalitarian ones, nor would they allow a libertarian social order. The state is not, therefore, an appropriate tool for bringing about a classless post-capitalist society [Carter, 1989, 185].

Some anarchists have maintained a stronger hypothesis that the social structures remain the same regardless of the change in personnel in the political class, hence the anarchist slogan 'whoever you vote for the government always gets in' [Organise! No. 27, 7]. Yet underneath the rhetoric there is the recognition that changing government does have wider social affects. The electoral victories of Conservative Party, for example, had specific consequences for manufacturing sectors and state enterprise [Morris, 1992, 4]. Anarchists are aware that a fascist or ecological government might make drastic changes to social and economic relations and alter forms of oppression [ACF, 1997e, 17]. But even a radical socialist seizure of the state will not produce an egalitarian social order.

Increasingly, the choice between different electoral parties has come to be seen as progressively less significant. Richard Morris of the AWG predicted what the result of a Labour victory in 1992 would achieve. 'Behind the waffle and a few token initiatives, their economic policies are identical to the Tories' [Morris, 1992, 4]. The extension of capitalism into all aspects of social life has meant that all the main political parties have accepted economic liberalism not just pragmatically but as an ideal. So close are the main political parties on their social and economic policies that the tendency in British anarchism is increasingly towards the stronger hypothesis, that the elections between the main parties offer no choice at all [Class War No. 53, 3].

If an oppositional government does stand in the way of the groups with real power, and does not have the means to defend itself then it will be overthrown either by a military coup, such as Salvador Allende's in Chile in 1973, by intrigue, such as Harold Wilson's Labour government of 1974-6 [Class War, 1992, 47] or through funding and publicising the merits of the favoured opposition. The anarchists' point is not that parliament is unimportant, it is after all where the legitimacy of the British legislative system is mythically supposed to lie. Their point is that it is part of the apparatus of class domination and consequently cannot be used to forward egalitarian aims.⁴⁰

In contrast to representative politics, direct action operates in the multiple locations (geographical and functional) where oppression lies. As such it is associated with localised campaigns. Constitutional politics, on the other hand, is committed to remedy social problems through institutions that are not directly involved with the issue. Such constitutional activity transfers the geography of rebellion from the home ground of the activist to the protected walls of the Palace of Westminster. It mediates change, while in direct action the groups in charge are those immediately affected.

While Lenin agreed that the sites of power lay outside of parliamentary institutions, he maintains that parliamentarianism is necessary for propaganda purposes. It demonstrates the dissolute and repressive nature of liberal institutions [Lenin, 1976, 57 & Lenin, 1975, 60 & 120]. Parliamentarianism also helps to develop revolutionary leaders and encourages party unity [Lenin, 1976, 61]. But this means, as Marcuse points out, that even those parties which historically were revolutionary are "condemned" to be non-radical' once they accept the constitutional rules and serve to further integrate opposition into support for the existing system [Marcuse, 1986, 20-1]. The revolutionary party apes the repressive characteristics of the constitutional parties in order to play the parliamentary game.

⁴⁰ Recent accounts that compare anarchism with the post-structuralism of Michel Foucault, Gilles Deleuze, Felix Guattari and Jean-Francois Lyotard, have located areas of similarity in the belief that oppression is multi-layered and diffuse. Anarchists and radical post-structuralists consider power to be diffuse and they believe that attempts to combat heteronomous authority through the instruments of monolithic organisation, merely reconstitute power

British anarchists take great delight in highlighting how professedly revolutionary groups demonstrate their repressive character in using parliamentary tactics. Class War, AF, Black Flag and in particular Trotwatch, for example, illustrate how some orthodox marxist groups actually conform to the very social structures they proposit to confront. 'Tommy Sheridan (recent Parliamentary candidate for Scottish Militant Labour) and Steve Nally (both Militant men) have never for one minute let the interests of effective working class resistance to the poll tax, come before the interests of their party, or the Metropolitan Police for that matter' [Trotwatch, Summer 1992, 7].⁴¹ Constitutional processes involve rewriting political demands in terms that are acceptable to those who hold constitutional power. Jane Jacobs, a theorist on city planning, relates how a community campaign in New York required the involvement of representatives of the local power elite to ensure success. Without this support, fighting local government through constitutional means would be futile [Jacobs, 1974, 135]. Playing by constitutional rules involves accepting the existing hierarchies of power.

In theory the appeal to electors does not contradict anarchism, as the oppressed are in the majority.⁴² However, electoral success requires the involvement with the media - multi-national, capitalist corporations who are at odds with anarchistic methods/aims. In Britain this takes the form of wooing of the major media magnates. Rupert Murdoch's support for Tony Blair, for example, was widely seen and do not redistribute it [May, 1994, 12-4].

⁴² At least according to the class struggle anarchists. See for instance Pugh, 2000, 8.

as a key feature in the defeat of John Major and the long serving Conservative administration [Roy Greenslade, The Guardian Media Section, 15.12.97, 7]. The owners and controllers of the main media outlets are hugely wealthy and powerful people whose interests will not be those of the vast majority [Institute of Social Disengineering, 1994, 7]. Meaningful participation in constitutional elections involves appealing to agencies whose interests are inimical to working class anarchism.

Political groupings aiming to gain power through electoral means place less emphasis on action to solve current social problems in the hope that they will be resolved once they gain office. The Labour Party's refusal to support anti-Poll Tax activity, for example, was justified on the grounds that they would abolish this form of local taxation once they gained office, that state power was the more effective and legitimate response than that of the poll tax resistors. The Labour Party sought to undermine immediate local popular resistance as they regarded the legitimate arena for political activity to be in one singular geographically distinct area (the Palace of Westminster). If the political party is unsuccessful in being elected then activity is directed towards 'party work, bar-room debate and buying the correct newspaper' [Organise! No. 27, 7]. Internal democracy also has to take second place, as the presentation of the party to the electorate takes precedence. [ACF, 1997e, 6]

For anarchists there is a practical implication of direct action which cannot be evaluated in terms of achievement of goals: Even when direct action fails in winning its long term or immediate ends, by taking part the agents of change have enhanced their autonomy as a result of their involvement. By contrast, when constitutional activity fails, its activists, claim Class War, have only gained skills for advancement into managerial activities within the system they claimed to oppose [Rhys, 1988e, 28].

The rejection of representation by anarchists does not apply just to the constitutional political process. Political representation is merely the most obvious form in which one group seeks to speak for another. Anarchists attempt, as May points out, to wrest control back into all other planes, 'the ethical, the social and the psychological, for instance' [May, 1994, 48]. Liberation refuses mediation, as only the oppressed can emancipate themselves: no group however benevolent can liberate another. Autonomy and liberation involves oppressed groups determining their own values rather than embracing those of the hegemonic authority.

7. Symbolic Action and Direct Action

Symbolic actions are those acts that aim to raise awareness to an issue or injustice, but by-themselves they do not resolve the problem itself. They are acts that signify other acts. There are many forms of symbolic action: parades, marches, vigils, fasts, slogans, songs, festivals, badges, flags and salutes [Carter, 1983, 23 & 27]. It can be argued that all direct action is symbolic in that its means are a partial example of the wider set of anti-hierarchical interactions. They are synecdochic of a liberated society. Direct action may act as a totem of wider protest. The squats, such as the ones in Wanstead in the early 1990s, created barricade sculpted out of abandoned cars. These were designed to slow down the development of controversial and ecologically destructive new roads. It also acted as a dramatic emblem of wider environmental protest. Direct action is prefigurative. It immediately empowers the oppressed class. Symbolic action, on the other hand, is often mediated and the methods are not incorporated in the objectives. The efficacy of symbolic action is dependant on mediating power for translation.

In her discussion of symbolic action, April Carter does not refer to direct action, although others have done so, such as the anarchist academic Lindsay Hart. He places certain forms of symbolic behaviour in the category of direct action, for instance 'bearing witness', where groups observe and publicise wrongdoing. However Hart recognises that unless symbolic action is tied to an 'effective part of a broader whole' it has no practical consequence. Hart suggests that only when symbolic action has practical characteristics can it be also included in the category of direct action [Hart, 1997, 48].

The term 'symbolic action' is restricted here to those events which are not in themselves an attempt to resolve the problem at hand directly but are metonymical (an attribute of a phenonema used to signify the whole) for instance the making the hand in fist salute to stand for resistance to heteronomous (external) power [Big Flame, 1981e, 6 & Green Anarchist, No. 26, 15] or displaying a poster of parliament in flames as an image of more general revolt [London Class War Special Issue, Shut Down Parliament, 1 & 3]. Symbolic action can also be metaphorical. Examples include vigils outside prisons and detention centres [Taking Liberties No. 16, 2]. Symbolic acts and direct action are not necessarily distinct. Yelling slogans (apparently symbolic acts) are used to raise courage and frighten the enemy prior to breaking through a police line (direct action). However, action which is purely symbolic is rejected by egalitarian anarchists because of its limitations. There is little point in yelling and then leaving the police lines in tact.

Symbolic acts, which appear to refer solely to the representative realm, can alter the very relationships of knowledge-power that underpin the order of signification and inspire practical prefigurative action. The political scientist David Apter identifies the way that symbolic actions affect the self-identification of those contesting and detourning the symbol [Apter, 1971, 9-10]. The detournement of advertising hoardings and the manipulation of everyday language, such as the juxtaposition of previously unconnected words ('demand the impossible', 'senseless acts of beauty') demonstrate the ideological hold of the dominant culture and can also be classed as direct action.⁴³ The process of resistance creates different perceptions that break the hold of the status quo. Anarchists are rightly critical of tactics whose aim is to limit the extension of action, such as symbolic acts that have a prescribed reference applied to them, or allow only an elite group to determine its signification.

Attack International criticise symbolic actions such as marches and rallies, as they are seen to encourage passivity and hierarchical divisions between the 'leaders' and 'followers'. Symbolic acts can have their meanings prescribed by those with greater social power that seek to control their interpretation. Attack International, in an ironic swipe at such symbolic actions, recreate a mock leaflet for a dignified 'March Against Anything'⁴⁴ which covers the main reasons for opposing such actions. Particular targets are the organisers who control the signification of the act.

Let us march as one to show our governments how cross we are about the state of the world.

⁴⁴ 'March Against Anything' is an updated version of an early 1980s situationist-inspired publication [Marcus, 1989, 54].

But for this demonstration to be effective, we must march with dignity and unity. Comrades, a disciplined march is essential, if we are to avoid losing the support of the media, the international press and the police. So please remember to follow the rules of the demonstration [....] And please obey all commands given by the stewards and police, who will be working together throughout the afternoon to ensure peace.

At the end of the march, there will be a long rally, with speeches by several very important people. After the rally, please disperse as quickly as possible and make your way home peacefully....

With your co-operation, we can make today a massive success, and start building for a repeat performance next year [Attack Attack Attack, 9].

Not only are the symbolic meanings fixed by those in dominant hierarchical positions, but in securing them the signs reflect this restraint. For instance, the highly structured and passive marches through indifferent streets symbolise less resistance to oppressive power than the passivity of the crowd. The demonstration does not resolve the problem it sought to highlight, but accents the political power of those who manage the march, and the liberality of the state which allows opposition (albeit toothless) onto the streets. The organisers do not facilitate the desired social change, as this would end their role of leaders of the campaign. The end result is that they control of opposition and profit from it - an attitude characterised by the phrase 'Join the struggle buy the t-shirts' [Attack Attack Attack, 9].

Symbolic actions are an opportunity for those with a grievance to let off steam. The ACF report of the demonstrations held on October 25 and 30, 1992 to save the coal mines (due to close by order of the Conservative government) stresses that despite the massive size of the demonstration the pit closure plan went ahead unchanged.

The demonstrations and related activity were designed to divert and demoralise. People were meant to feel that they had done their bit, that after all, nothing could be changed, and after a dreary walk through driving rain, they must go home and accept 'Things as they are' [Organise! Jan-March 1993, No. 29, 3].

Although demonstrations appear to engage those who are oppressed in some way by the current state of affairs, they encourage submission. Anarchists promote instead active confrontation of oppression by those directly affected. Class War handed out their leaflets at the marches against the 1994 Criminal Justice Act encouraging marchers to act directly themselves, to break out from the pre-set symbolic representation into practical action [leaflet reprinted in Booth, 1996, 102].

Marches need to gain media coverage to be symbolically affective, so the real agents are not those participating but the recorders of the event. As Nicholas Garnham in his critical analysis of democratic participation points out:

People who stage demonstrations in order to obtain media coverage have been persuaded by the media to forget what direct action is all about. For surely one of the basic motives behind direct action is just to escape from the image and substitute for it a concrete reality, an action. Direct action is a revolt against the use of language in political communication. Instead of talking or writing about democratic participation, it acts it out, and by doing so it cuts down the manipulative possibilities inherent in any language [Garnham, 1972, 293].

Symbolic action is twice mediated. The agents who bring about change are not those that are in a subjugated position, as such methods rely upon the media. Institutions of effective mass communication are not subject to democratic participation [Garnham, 1972, 295-6]. Moreover, such symbolic action brings about change not in the current situation but in the future. Direct action on the other hand, through its immediacy discourages mediating forces. It attempts to reinterpret acts for their own purposes and allows for participants to ascribe their own interpretations onto events. It also ensures that, while the interests of those in the future are considered, the subjects of oppression benefit now.

Confronting and distorting the symbolic structures of a society can alter the order of signification and consequently disrupt established relationships of knowledge-power. It can also impact on the sense of identity of those involved. Radical teachers, such as Ivan Illich and Paulo Friere for example, who questioned the whole hierarchy of traditional pedagogy and came to question their own role as specialist 'educators'.⁴⁵ Such activity can be so threatening to existing power structures that the perpetrators risk severe punishment, the acts being labelled pejoratively as 'blasphemy', 'terrorism' or 'violence'. Symbolic action that follows the model of direct action, by undermining the practices that impose repressive identities do so directly rather than through a mediating power and in doing so break these classifications.

⁴⁵ Apter also considers that disrupting the symbolic order and the adopting 'anti-roles' leads to the creation of new identities, rather than the abandonment of roles themselves [Apter, 1971, 8].

8. Direct Action and Violence

The question of violence and whether it is compatible with prefiguration has caused much debate within anarchist circles. Critical accounts of anarchism have frequently concentrated upon the tactical approaches to violence within libertarian traditions. No other political or anti-political philosophies have had to contend with such consistent (and de-contextualised) interrogation on this point. Despite the bloodier histories of free-market individualists, Conservatism and state socialism - the caricature of these movements rarely embraces hooliganism, and few commentators interrogate these movements on whether they advocate violence. The traditional stereotype of the anarchist as bearded, black-cloaked bomb-thrower, or more recently the chaotic hooligan has lead to some activists and theorists to disassociate themselves from such unpalatable connotations. Thus they create the title anarchist-pacifist or anarcho-pacifist - where there is no pacifist-conservatives or nationalist-pacifists. The existence of this influential minority within anarchism suggests that those libertarians who do not distinguish themselves in these terms are somehow hopelessly wedded to violence. By discussing anarchism with respect to the issue of violence, one once again re-associates these terms although the objective of this section is to disentangle and clarify.

The adherence of anarchism to prefiguration would seem to imply that anarchists must rule out using violent means to reach a peaceful end. The argument is often put in the following form: the aim of anarchists is a liberated, non-violent society. As the means of bringing this about must match the objectives then anarchists must commit themselves to the use of solely pacifist tactics as violent means would contravene the prefigurative imperative: 'Only by adopting non-violent means [...] can we ever hope to achieve a non-violent society' [Morland, 1997, 21].

Baldelli restates the Kantian rejection of instrumentalism (discussed on pages 115-7), and then affirms the claim that a prefigurative ethic prescribes a commitment to pacifism.

The renunciation of violence and deception, however motivated, is the first and fundamental condition to the achievement of freedom and peaceful existence as well as to their preservation once achieved. This renunciation is thus a means-cum-end, a truly moral value [Baldelli, 1971, 165].⁴⁶

The preference for non-violence based on prefigurative grounds has been a consistent issue in anarchist debate, from the anti-nuclear campaigners of the early 1980s - such as the Feminist and Non-

It is both a principle and a technique, a set of ideas about how life should be lived and a strategy for social change. Respect for life is a fundamental feature, together with the desire for liberation. This means not deliberately killing, hurting, threatening or putting fear into others, in short not treating [your enemy?] as less human than ourselves [F&NSG, 1983, 26].

In 1995 Chan summarises the pacifist-anarchist position:

If an act of violence was wrong, then it was wrong no matter who perpetrated it. If anarchists wanted a society based on mutual respect and rational persuasion then they should prove their commitment to this by practising what they preached [Chan, 1995, 56].

Violent Study Group (F&NSG) - to the road and anti-Criminal Justice Act protestors of more recent periods.⁴⁷ Not all anarchists accept this disposition. On the contrary, the influence of pacifists within contemporary British anarchism is probably overstated.⁴⁸

The anarchist movement in Britain is divided between the pacifists and the non-pacifists. The first includes mostly liberal groupings such as the Freedom Press Group,⁴⁹ Advanced Party and Freedom Network, and an informal coalition derisively referred to as the 'Fluffies'.⁵⁰ The other side includes the class struggle groups such as AF, Black Flag, Class War and Solfed. Green Anarchist originally had pacifist origins but has long since abandoned this principle. Class-struggle anarchists are not, however, contravening their prefigurative criteria by accepting violent tactics as will be discussed below: The pacifist argument rests on a confused and contradictory conception of violence.

⁴⁹ See for instance Richards in Room, 1993, 50-1

⁵⁰ This name probably came about as a result of one of the slogans used by the Freedom Network, instructing their supporters to 'Keep it Fluffy' in their demonstrations against the 1994 Criminal Justice Act. In response anarchists demanded that they 'keep it spikey' [Organise! issue 36, 5-6; Q. Class War in Booth, 1996, 102]

8.1. Identifying Violence

Class struggle anarchists reject holding pacifism as a universal principle. They consider that violence is often necessary to protect and advance the revolutionary subject. As a result it is occasionally desirable and does not conflict with prefiguration. The general social context, in which the injustices of the everyday are so ingrained that they are hardly questioned, means that many forms of violence are ignored. Beneficiaries of 'institutional' or 'structural' violence are so assured of the legitimacy of their coercive behaviour that it passes without comment. Class struggle anarchists reject the passive acceptance of institutional force.

Depending on characterisations of violence, one could argue in opposition to the pacifist position that anarchism does not presume that all violence would be absent from non-hierarchical social relations. Certain forms of consensual role-playing such, as mild S&M would still be classed as violent but not precluded from a liberated social order.

One can distinguish between morally neutral violent acts, such as sparring and morally more questionable acts of violence, such as assault and intimidation (a taxonomy developed later by John Harris) [Harris, 1983]. The argument for non-violence could then be re-written in terms of non-coercive behaviour [Baldelli, 1971, 45-6]. However, class struggle anarchists maintain that they are still being consistent with the prefigurative criteria by not refusing all coercive activity, as it may be justified according to the social context in which it is used and the actor who uses it.

The category of 'violence' is certainly confused. During the Gulf War, CND opposed the use of military weaponry against Iraq. They argued instead for economic sanctions, a form of coercion, against the country. These sanctions have caused the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Iraqi citizens. So too, Miller has posited Gandhi's economic boycotts as 'non-violent forms of resistance to the state' [Miller, 1984, 122], but as others, including Reinhold Niebuhr have explained, these embargoes caused considerable hardship to Lancashire textile workers who had little influence on policy decisions in India. Class struggle anarchists are shown not to be more favourably disposed to violence than others, but merely less hesitant in admitting that they use it.

The absolutist position on non-violence requires non-action in circumstances in which violence is the only possible reaction and therefore leads to quietism and passivity [Organise!, No. 36, 5-6]. As a result of this acquiescence, greater avoidable acts of violence occur. The F&NSG argued along these lines in their recognition of abortion as an act of violence, but yet permissible as the alternative of state restraints on the autonomy of women would be a greater wrong. Thus, it becomes not a matter of rejecting violence as a whole, but particular acts of violence.

The problem of identifying 'violence' is exacerbated because the term is not an analytical category, but is constructed as an expression of class prejudice [Class War, No. 52, 8]. The institutional violence of everyday living whether in the alienation of the workplace or the discipline of state apparatuses - is excluded from the calculations of liberal-pacifist traditions. The mainstream commercial media that castigated the events of Mayday this year (2000) for the hostility and carnage, in particular the graffiti on the cenotaph war memorial were similarly celebratory in support of the bloodshed in Serbia the previous year. Yet the acts of violence perpetuated with the support of the ruling class are rarely described in terms of violence - the term is used solely as a pejorative label for actions that are disapproved of by those in a position to apply the taxonomy.⁵¹ This view is endorsed by Niebuhr who noted that while the middle classes claim to abhor violence but often use it for their own end, while also failing to recognise that violence might be a response to their physical force [Niebuhr, 1941, 176].

Various diagnostic tools for the identification of violence have been posited in order to maintain the pacifist position, none of which are successful. One such method relies on the acts and omissions doctrine. In a situation where there is a choice between an act or inaction both of which have equal probability of leading to a violent or coercive conclusion, the doctrine suggests inaction is morally preferable. The doctrine states that 'in certain contexts, failure to perform an act, with certain foreseen bad consequences of that failure, is morally less bad than to perform a different act which has the identical foreseen bad consequences' [Glover, 1993, 92]. There are a number of objections to this doctrine. Jonathan Glover presents many examples where inaction is worse than action. Refraining to give food and allowing people to starve to death, for example, indicates that there is nothing inherent in inaction that assures its moral supremacy. In some instances inaction or omission can be reinterpreted as purposive acts. Not feeding a prisoner, for instance, is not merely an omission but the act of starving an inmate.

Niebuhr tries to give a workable definition of violence based on the 'intent to destroy either life or property' [Niebuhr, 1941, 240]. This definition proves inadequate on a number of grounds, however, as it fails to take into account injuries that are not life threatening. Even if these were included, a consistent pacifist position on the definition of violence still proves to be problematic. Failure to carry out a minor destructive act may be to permit far greater excesses. Tolstoy, for instance, considered it a breach of pacifist principles to kill a murderer about to kill a child, even if this was the only way of saving the victim. Blanket prohibition on the use of violence can permit far greater violence.

It may be countered that the violence resulting from Tolstoy's murderer as a consequence of the failure to act, is not the intended result of the pacifist's principled passivity, but rather the foreseeable consequence of the failure to act. This argument has previously been discussed with respect to Kant's axe-returning neighbour (pages 116-119). This depends on a clear distinction between the foreseeable and the intentional. As the class struggle libertarian Aufheben discusses, the anarchist-pacifist argument regards personal commitment to avoiding violence as more important than saving life. It cannot be considered synecdochic of the desired set of social relations. Aufheben argues that this form of absolutist pacifism is indicative of liberal thinking. Like lifestyle anarchism, it stresses individuals, their actions and intentions, as the ultimate basis for evaluation, in isolation from the wider social context in which the act takes place [Aufheben, No.3, Summer 1994, 19].

Unequivocal pacifists, such as Chan, Morland or the Advanced Party, see all individuals as the same, condemning both the aggressor and also the victim if the latter uses coercion to overcome their oppression. Class struggle anarchists, on the other hand, point to the differences in social power and recognise that the prevention of further oppression may require resistance that is sometimes physically coercive. Creating non-hierarchical associations may involve breaking authoritarian relation. Those who benefited from oppressive power-structures would consider such transgression to be violent.

Egalitarian anarchists do not regard non-action as a result of principled pacifism to be morally less valid than action. Black Flag, in a response to the pacifist anarchist Anark, give examples of not only excusable, but morally desirable and possibly mandatory, coercive violence such as resistance to the Nazis and Communist secret police [Black Flag Supplement No. 3, 5]. By refusing to act in a coercive manner one would be conniving with existing totalitarian governance. Assaults that sought to create non-hierarchical social relations, may well be violent, but would be more in keeping with the ends than peaceful inaction or martyrdom.

Non-coercive techniques advocated by pacifists are often covertly tyrannical, as in the reduction of education to propaganda [Niebuhr, 1941, 245; Christie & Meltzer, 1984, 60]. Other revolutionaries argue that Gandhian non-violence - 'soul-force' which seeks to change the minds of the oppressors through reason and positive example, confers onto the adversary qualities which they do not have or which would not be in their interests to exercise [Jackson, 1971, 154]. The proponents of 'soul-force' make the agents of change the oppressors, as it is from them that transformation is desired.

8.2. Violence and the Working Class

Chapter III examines the taxonomy and identity of the 'working class', understood by anarchists to be the appropriate agent of social change. Yet some mention must be made at this point to explain the association of violence with class struggle anarchism. While there were pacifists in the 1950s Syndicalist Workers Federation, and contemporary non-class struggle groups such as GA and Lancaster Bomber who approve of violence, there is a strong correlation between class-struggle groups and the rejection of pacifism, an association which requires an explanation. For some writers, like McKay, the acceptance of violence is equivalent to leftism and class struggle [McKay, 1998, 17].⁵² Class struggle anarchists not only permit but encourage those facing oppression to overthrow it, even if this involves the use of physical coercion. Socialist libertarians recognise that existing structures of domination maintain their authority through violence and that in resisting further subjugation, and in creating non-hierarchical social relations, conflict with these oppressive institutions is inevitable.

Martin Wright, a co-founder of Class War, discussed the different patterns of rejection of pacifism amongst working class and middle class anarchists.⁵³ In the late 1960s to the early 1980s Wright, and the then few working class members of anarchist groups, saw violent means as a natural expression for confronting heteronomous power, and therefore to be welcomed. Middle class anarchists considered such responses to be barely distinct from fascism. Wright argued that the reason for this difference between the middle and working class activists was down to their respective life-experiences. Working class people, he argued, grew up amongst greater violence, whether at schools, in family relationships and in the generality of working class culture, as part of the preparation for and result of more physically demanding labour. As a result, violence becomes just another aspect of the communication between and within the working class which is absent from middle classes who regard it as alien.

Criticisms can be levelled against Wright's analysis. There have been significant changes in employment patterns. Manual labour no longer employs the majority of working class people. Furthermore, it is by no means true that working class families are any more violent or have a greater propensity to use physical coercion than middle class ones. Indeed, it is argued, the barbarities of boarding schools would compare unfavourably with contemporary comprehensive education where corporal punishment is now banned. It is argued that if Wright's analysis had any verisimilitude then it would hold less true in the late 1990s with the decline of unskilled manual labour and the growth of the tedious, demeaning but less physically arduous, service sector.

A number of replies can be made. Firstly, there is strong anecdotal evidence, as well as the reports of sociologists such as Robins & Cohen which indicate that because of their position in society, working class people face greater harassment and violence than the middle classes, whether this be the casual assaults of street-crime, structural physical coercion, or from state bodies such as the police [Robins & Cohen, 1978, 108-9]. Furthermore, the working classes may well be aware that as their social position is maintained by institutional violence which is not overtly defined as such, then they are more conscious that meaningful change might require a physical response. As a result, they might regard political violence in a more positive light.

Class War, like Sorel, regards violence much more positively. They both identify pacifism with consent to the rules and conventions of the dominant class and both celebrate examples of working class violence.⁵⁴ They both regard it as essential to historical progress and the revolutionary project. Acquiescence encourages peaceful, continuous repression. Conversely for Sorel, violence is synonymous with virility and dynamism.

Destructiveness helps to strengthen class resolve amongst the workers and releases their repressed desires [Sorel, 1967, 78 & 91]. Class War restated that violence represented the vitality of class struggle, turning it (once again) into a festival for the oppressed to gain materially and rediscover their strength.⁵⁵ Violence is celebrated then, because it is necessary for the development of the revolutionary class.

In contrast the advocates of 'bearing witness' felt that the spur to action could be found in representations of brutal oppression against 'innocent victims'. Class War pointed out that such Violence is the key to working class confidence. Where the class is confident it fights back....

When it comes to violence remember - THEY STARTED IT!

Remember - the police have murdered loads of black and white people over the years. We have killed no-one, yet it is us who are labelled 'violent yobs'!! This is real capitalist/media double speak [Class War Federation, 1999, 4].

representations of working class people as passive or innocent victims of state violence, found in left-wing newspapers, demoralised rather than encouraged agents of change [Class War, 1992, 17-9]. In their place they published the crumpled figures of bleeding police officers.⁵⁶ The photographs helped to illustrate the vulnerability of dominating forces and the possibility that oppressed groups could overcome their persecutors. Class struggle anarchists' justification for violence is based on an acceptance that methods, which forge egalitarian social relations, will conflict with existing hierarchical social practices.

The context in which pacifists find it hard to maintain their absolute rejection of violence is self-defence. The question of the legitimacy of self-defence involves defining what one means by self. Many pacifists conform to the liberal tag placed upon them by class struggle libertarians and see violence in terms of immediate harm to the abstract individual. Some of those interviewed by Chan do indeed differ from Gandhi and accept the legitimacy of self-defence as either moral or value-neutral. They cite cases of women defending themselves from spousal abuse as legitimate activities [Chan, 1995, 59]. The inconsistencies of the pacifist approach become apparent when some of the pacifists accept activities such as strike action or ecotage (sabotage carried out for environmental aims) in defence of individual well-being. Such action causes considerable destruction to the property, and physical inconvenience. In contrast, social anarchists consider actions provoked by risk of harm to the community to be self-defence [Chan, 1995, 60]. Those who are the subject of oppression are not only permitted but also encouraged by anarchists to overthrow the forces oppressing them, even if this involves the use of violent coercion.

In many examples those who call themselves pacifists reject an absolutist position, seeking merely to limit violence to its minimum. This position is similar to that of class struggle anarchists, except the latter include in their assessment the everyday intimidation of dominant practices which often go unnoticed.⁵⁷ April Carter makes a distinction between unacceptable and acceptable forms of violence. In the latter category she includes those acts that aim to resist heteronomous power, are performed by those affected and that have a good chance of success. This latter stipulation infers for Carter ensuring the act has widespread support [Carter, 1973, 130]. Her formulation is close, but not identical, to the class struggle anarchist position. The difference is that anarchists would accept (on the whole) violent acts in certain contexts where the ends are unlikely to be fulfilled. Brave but doomed efforts at self-defence, for example are seen as prefigurative in that the forms of resistance provide opportunities to create anti-hierarchical, creative social relations. Anarchists consider acts of resistance as providing opportunities to engage in solidarity with other similarly oppressed individuals. Certain methods of contestation however, like particular types of terrorism, restrict avenues for solidarity and reify subject identities, as will be discussed in Chapters Four and Five.

8.3. Tactical Violence

There are positive side effects to non-violence that provide a good tactical, rather than principled basis for its contingent adoption. The methods covered by NVDA make it harder for the state to use extreme oppressive countervailing power, whereas the ostentatious promotion of violence, such as the carrying of weaponry by the Black Panthers, provides cover for extreme state intervention [Carter, 1973, 21]. Similarly it is argued that in cases of brutal intercession by the state, whether in Sharpville or Bloody Sunday, public opinion can turn sharply against the state. Thus, non-violence is seen to have pragmatic virtues in winning popular support and avoiding extreme consequences for activists.

Aufheben criticise this argument claiming that it is not violence which promotes physical attack, but the success of a campaign. 'Of course, cops don't always need 'excuses'; so long as they're physically capable, they trash you if they think you're effective, not just when you are "violent"' [Aufheben No. 3, Summer 1994, 20]. But the fact that oppressive forces have to go to the trouble of either covering up their actions (such as the Battle of the Beanfield 1985) or using agent provocateurs (such as the Littlejohn brothers in the war in Ireland) suggests that the state recognise that improper action is a more risky strategy against less obviously violent movements [Wolfie & Speed et. al., 1982, 12; Sanguinetti, 1982]. This positive side effect, however, which is not true in all situations, does not justify a blanket rejection of violent activities. Support for non-violence on the grounds of effectiveness is contingent and tactical, not the basis for an absolute principle.

Another benefit associated with non-violence is increased popular support and ease of organisation [Miller, 1984, 123]. However, there is no convincing evidence that the broad mass of people support pacifism. Unwillingness to use more effective, violent, measures maybe indicative of bad faith. The Poll Tax riots led to no noticeable decrease in support for the wider campaign against the Community Charge. In contrast to the difficulties in violent, (anti-)political organisation, non-violent groups are less subject to state interference. Yet, not all violent tactics require organisation as they can be undertaken spontaneously. A later chapter will discuss forms of organisation, but the standard conception of anarchist organisations, admired by Miller, as open, consensual groupings, need not be the only form consistent with prefigurative politics.

The defence of violence put forward by class struggle anarchists does not mean that they advocate it as the only response. Certainly, violence can help break the consensus that has kept certain groups in an inferior position, and can act as a symbol of their discontent, which had previously been easier to ignore. Likewise class-struggle anarchists, even Class War, do not consider all acts of violence to be uniformly advisable, nor do they consider non-violence necessarily as a sign of weakness. Aufheben and the London anarchists behind the Hungry Brigade (1997) accept that non-violence, in certain circumstances, is a better tactic than those more commonly used by revolutionaries.

British anarchists advanced violent methods because the pacifist tactics that dominated the early 1980s protest had been successfully neutralised by the strategies of the state. Tactics such as lying in the middle of the road to block traffic and provoke arrest (sit downs) had become little more than empty rituals for the participants. NVDA had become elite symbolic activities. However by 1997, many of the non-pacifist tactics used by the anarchists over a decade earlier had also been successfully contained by the state. The ruck with the police which had startled the assembled officers at Molesworth in 1984, was by the time of the 1997 March for Social Justice (also known as Reclaim the Future) in central London, just as much a ritual as CND's sit downs [Hungry Brigade, 1997, 2]. Dominating powers learn to control and integrate tactical developments, and their meanings are constrained by state intervention. The failure to adopt fresh methods results in ossification and reification.

While class struggle activists may question certain violent tactics, and regard others categorised as 'non-violent' as more appropriate, they refuse to advocate non-violence as a principle. Class struggle activists increasingly see NVDA to be tactically appropriate in specific contexts. If other means are more useful and prefigurative, then they should be used even if they involve violence.⁵⁸

Evaluation of anarchist positions according to the prefigurative ethics they espouse, implicitly or explicitly, provides a diagnostic for highlighting the inconsistencies in their own accounts of social change and contradictions within their methods. Central to the prefigurative approach, exemplified in direct action, is the role of agency. Egalitarian anarchists prioritise the working class as the agent of change. They do so at a time when most other theorists have renounced class analysis. Anarchism's conception of the revolutionary class differs from that of traditional marxist conceptions from the Second International. It is against this alternative socialist approach to agency and the additional weaknesses of class analysis provided by feminist and post-structuralist accounts, that an ideal-type anarchist notion of agency is developed, one that is consistent with the prefigurative ethic. This paradigm also shares key characteristics with politically engaged post-structuralisms.

⁵⁸ This defence of violence is not necessarily a vindication of terrorism. While Miller, amongst others, rightly distinguishes between violence and terrorism in his account of anarchism and violence, all his examples of anarchist violence are drawn from terrorist incidents, thereby re-associating the two [Miller, 1984]. Consequently his examples involve use of paternalistic behaviour, or assaults on agents who are not involved in the oppression of the subjugated group. These are not features of violent political behaviour per se.

Agents of Change

Chapter Three

Agents of Change

Introduction

Libertarian action requires not only that the methods prefigure the ends but also that appropriate agents must instigate the means. Those subjected to oppression must be the primary actors in overcoming it, and must do so in a manner in keeping with anarchist principles. The task here is not to analyse whether the anarchist assessment of capitalism is correct, nor to describe how oppression creates subject identities, but to illustrate what forms of subjugated agents would be consistent with anti-hierarchical prefiguration (the anarchist ideal). A second, inter-related, task of this chapter is to assess whether the revolutionary subjects espoused by contemporary anarchist groups are compatible with this ideal.

The identification of the appropriate social category that will assume the role of the revolutionary subject is fundamental to the success of liberatory tactics, and as such is also essential for an evaluation of current methods. This section looks at how modes of oppression help create the identities of the agents of change and how the category of moral agent differs significantly from Leninist classifications and those of other strategic theorists and extends beyond the category of the proletariat. The theory of the anarchist ideal subject is constructed through engagement with Autonomist marxist and post-structural conceptions of power.

The aim of this chapter is to trace some of the sources from which the archetypal anarchist agency appears - namely the group of people capable of acting in a liberatory manner. Starting by tracking some of the histories of class in anarchism it continues to show the way in which the notion was progressively extended to include other groups and subject positions. Marxism, and its Leninist interpretation, is still an important influence on revolutionary politics in Britain. Although anarchists differentiate themselves from orthodox marxism, nonetheless many still retain a commitment to the economic determinism and strategic politics characteristic to Leninism. The revisions by neo-marxist and marxian radicals, such as Gorz, the autonomist and situationists are significant alterations in recognising the scope of capitalist oppression and consequently extends the range of potential revolutionary subjects. Yet these revisions still ascribe priority to the economic base as a determinant of social relations. The anarchist ideal extends the notion further by not tying oppression to an objectively knowable singular power, but realises that different forces operate in different contexts. As such it shares important characteristics with the politically-engaged post-structuralisms of the likes of Deleuze & Guattari.

The egalitarian anarchist agents of change are those groups of people that through self-created anti-hierarchical bodies can successfully transform social relations. The revolutionary subject is described in class terms, yet is distinct from that of orthodox marxism. Class relations extend beyond the immediate economic sphere of production. Although economic forces are acknowledged as dominant in many contexts, other repressive practices operate that are not reducible to capitalism alone. The notion of the working class is not a pre-designated identity, economic or otherwise, but the identification of oppressed subject positions, which are increasingly products of economic forces. A feature of these subject positions is that they have particular tactical advantages within these contexts, such as more flexible and fluid responses to repression.

1. The Anarchist Ideal: A Concept of Class Agents

Anarchist moral agents are the oppressed subjects, but these agents are contingent and context related. An individual or group in one social position may be subject to heteronomous power, yet in another be wielding oppressive authority. Oppression does not have one ultimate source, so consequently there is no vanguard or universal agent whose liberation ends all oppression. However, the concept of 'class' is still important to anarchism because in most contexts (if not all) capitalism is one of the main oppressive powers, albeit in a much wider sense than the Leninist model (see below). In the contexts where anarchists self-identify, capitalism may be the main form of domination. As a result the anarchist agent of change even in the ideal form is still described in terms of the 'working class'. The groups this thesis has concentrated upon, have regarded economic exploitation as a major form of oppression and consequently have tended to see liberation in terms of class struggle. As will be shown here, in more recent times, many of these anarchist groups recognise that there are other forms of oppression, which are irreducible to capitalism alone. In different locations oppressed subjects are formed that are not primarily the result of economic powers. The dominance of class-based terminology amongst the class struggle anarchist movement, has led to many groups to still refer to the multiplicity of oppressed subjects under the singular (economic) category of the 'working class'. The continued application of the vocabulary of economics can give the impression that they are subsuming all subject identities under a single designation. Their intention in using this term is, often, however to signal plurality as they regard oppression to be multiform.

The revolutionary subject of the anarchist ideal, even when misleadingly termed the 'working class' is, however, diverse and evolving. The multiplicity of oppressed subject positions reflect the variety of forms that capitalist domination takes in pursuing surplus labour in areas beyond the mere point of production. By inhabiting many different locations oppressed agents can see similarities in the forms of hierarchy they face in each location. Feminist writers, for instance, recognised similarities in the operation of power in the workplace, leisure facilities and private sphere which developed into a general concept of patriarchy, whose operation subtly alters depending on context [C. Ehrlich, 1996, 169]. For the anarchist ideal oppression, such as homophobia, sexism, anti-semitism and racism are not restricted just to the extraction of profit.

At the heart of anarchism is the rejection of hierarchical relations. Repressive practices can come about through mediation, so consistent anarchism avoids representing others. Ideal type anarchism is motivated by the quest for liberation: the oppressed must have primacy in overthrowing their oppression. In the words of Marx, reaffirmed by the Situationist International, 'the emancipation of the proletariat will be the work of the proletariat itself' [Gray, 1974, 104]. The oppressed are the only ones capable of being the class in itself. The distinction between the class in (or by) itself and the class for itself is one found in Marx's writings and is endorsed by many contemporary libertarians.¹ The division has also been subject to further critical development by marxist. Marcuse explains that the group that can overthrow the existing system of production and exchange is in itself the revolutionary subject. The revolutionary subject 'for itself' is the group (or groups) that has an immediate vital desire for revolution, being self-consciously aware of its oppression and seeking to overthrow it. The section of the community that is in decisive need, or is otherwise willing to risk what they have for an entirely different social system, is the revolutionary subject for itself. Marcuse suggested that the Western, industrial working class of the 1960s was still the revolutionary subject in itself but not for itself [Marcuse, 1969, 326]. The agent of change is not only the subject of oppressive forces but also has the subjective potential for overcoming it.

[T]he present day working class, whose day-to-day existence is largely passive (acquiescent towards capitalism) and the revolutionary force that can overthrow capitalism. The latter will grow out of the former, but is not identical to it. The former (which can be called the "class-in-itself") is just a sociological category whereas the latter (the class-FOR-itself) is a revolutionary category [Subversion, No. 12, 14].

Other class-struggle groups have used slightly different terminology but made a similar demarcation between the revolutionary agent and the section(s) of the populace from which it emerges. The autonomists talk of class composition and decomposition, composition being the process by which the working class unifies and grows in technical, cultural and organisational affectiveness. Decomposition comes about when the opponents of the working class succeed in breaking down their power. In the 1980s this occurred with the dismantling of the welfare state and the de-centring of industry, which restrained the powers of the organisations of the mass workers such as trade unions [Witheyford, 1994, 90-1]. The stronger the composition of the working class the more significant it is as a revolutionary force and more potent the threat to capital.²

² Other anarchists such as in the 1971 American tract Anti-Mass Methods of Organisation for Collectives (Anti-Mass) reprinted by a number of British libertarians, such as in Christie's Investigative Reporters Handbook and the Welsh CGH anarchist publisher claims to have replaced class

Criticisms have been raised by a host of theorists concerning the formulation of the class for itself coming from the class in itself. The social critic Richard Sennet and writers in Green Anarchist, amongst others, reject the view that the working class(es) is (are) a revolutionary subject. These critics argue that revolutions have not been brought about by those sections of the community which have little or nothing to lose. Indeed the comparatively large number of middle class radicals, in contrast to the apparent apathy of those suffering from impoverished conditions, seem to support Sennet's case.³

The existence of an assembly of elite 'revolutionaries' is not fundamental to the success or otherwise of libertarian uprisings, as liberation cannot come from a mediating power. The anarchist ideal rejects the notion of an objectively identifiable set of universal 'revolutionaries'.⁴ It is through self-creative action that the analysis. On closer examination, however, the distinction they make between the 'mass' the 'passive' who 'see themselves as objects' and are the 'products of a specific social organisation' is similar in most respects to the class in itself [Anti-Mass, 1988, 9 & 1]. The 'class' which the authors of the tract distinguish from the mass is 'conscious of its social existence because it seeks to organise itself' and as such appears to be comparable to the class for itself [Anti-Mass, 1988, 1-2]. The main area of difference between the class for itself is that Anti-Mass prescribes a particular form of organisation for 'class' formation. There are other similar examples of debates of how the oppressed subject becomes for itself without necessarily using marxist terminology.

revolutionary class in itself transforms into the class for itself. Dominant practices and values are rejected and replaced by autonomous activity based on anti-hierarchical and egalitarian anarchic principles.⁵ The movement for the creation of anarchism is itself anarchist. The process of change involves those who do not identify themselves through the 'anarchist' label but nevertheless are oppressed and use tactics that are in accord with libertarian precepts. No group, including those who announce themselves as 'anarchists' can take the prior role in emancipating others, although they can, and do, take part in action that opposes their own oppressions.⁶

The anarchist ideal recognises that the revolutionary class for itself is not identical to the class in itself. Those who mistake the first for the latter reject areas of potential solidarity. An example would be Green Anarchist's refusal to support the sacked News International strikers as they had printed reactionary, racist and sexist publications.⁷ The Irrationalists, a group close to Green Anarchist, have contempt for the dispossessed and disadvantaged because they are not measuring up to a predetermined revolutionary model. Irrationalists describe subjugated groupings as the 'passive herd' and portray them, in their cartoons, in a scatalogical fashion [Lancaster Bomber, Autumn 1994, 11 & 15]. The flipside is to consider the sociological class as being innately for itself.

⁷ Albon, 'The Pieces of Silver' reprinted in Booth, 1996, 73.

According to the romantic vision of 'workerism' the working class in its current state is equivalent to an already revolutionary grouping [Purkis & Bowen, 1997, 196]. The archetypal anarchist response is not that the oppressed are already revolutionary, but that it is only through their self-activity that these groups can achieve liberation.

As May explains, anarchism's principle of direct participation of the oppressed in their own emancipation makes it responsive to the post-structuralism of Lyotard, Foucault and Deleuze. According to the anti-representative feature of libertarianism, one group may not decide upon the fate of, or claim the ability to speak for, another. There are two closely related reasons. First, as discussed in the previous section, representation, (and this extends beyond political representation), leads to the abuse of power and the (re)creation of hierarchical division between the powerful and powerless. The second reason, shared by post-structuralists and contemporary anarchists, is that as there are a multiplicity of irreducible forces that form the intersecting networks of power which constitute society, there is no privileged universal class. At each location different forces interact. Social space is constituted by these forces - it is not being something ahistoric and separate that contains them [May, 1994, 53].⁸

May uses Deleuze & Guattari's rhizome metaphor to explain the non-hierarchical relationship between forces.⁹ Unlike trees whose branches stem from a simply traced origin, rhizomes spread out roots which connect up to other roots, such that no single tuber constitutes the source. Consequently, as the multiple forms of power do not operate uniformly, or to the same degree at different points, so different political identities develop [May, 1994, 96]. There is no central political struggle, nor a universal group that represents all struggles. A vanguard would paternalistically impose one set of interests onto another. Instead post-structural (or ideal-type) anarchism recognises that different oppressed subjects appear in various contexts, with no singular entity having universal priority. When anarchists talk of working class resistance, they refer not to a single identity, but to a diverse changing multiplicity of resisting agents. The anarchist agent of change is context dependent such that although an individual or grouping in one geographical or historical context is subjected to heteronomous power, in another it can be regarded as an oppressive agency. Examples would include unemployed people who intimidate their gay neighbours, or businesspeople that face domestic violence or racial prejudice in other aspects of their life.

There are a number of different interpretations of the agent of change within contemporary anarchism. Some libertarians, still under the influence of Leninism, have a strategic analysis regarding all forms of oppression as emanating from a single objectively identifiable source. Other contemporary anarchists are closer to the ideal in which the identities are multiple and fluid, dependent on the diversity of forces operating locally, an approach that is consistent with post-structuralism. The extension from the single subject of Leninism (the industrial proletariat) to the anarchist ideal can either the host or the parasite, so too rhizomes create roots that are distinct from the constitutive combinations.

be traced through the influential theories of libertarian thinkers from the New Left, and autonomist marxist currents (including council-communism and situationism).

1.1. Agents in Anarchist Propaganda

The ideal model of the anarchist conceptions of class and class struggle is often neither explicit nor fully formed. It can, however be identified in and reconstructed from contemporary groupings such as the A(C)F, Black Flag, Class War and SolFed. The definitions and explanations of the archetypal libertarian agent of change borrow heavily from the interrelated autonomist and situationist traditions which helped form contemporary British anarchism and take on board their criticisms of traditional marxism [Cleaver, 1979, 52].¹⁰ It maintains that only the oppressed themselves are the revolutionary agents, and the oppressed is the working class. Alternatives to the tactical ideal are also present within British anarchist texts. Leninist conceptions of the revolutionary agent of change are also an important influence on anarchism as historically some libertarian groups have attempted to recreate the apparent success of the Bolsheviks by replicating their analysis, whilst other anarchists reacted to the authoritarianism of the Soviet experiment by developing antagonistic recommendations. The complex and multi-identitied ideal type anarchism agent becomes more comprehensible by examining its strengths against the limitations of Leninists and other models that have helped create the ideal.

There is no single position on the identity of the revolutionary agent in contemporary British anarchist writings. Indeed a single edition of Green Anarchist contained articles which proposed three distinct views on class, two of which dismiss class analysis as meaningless or tantamount to promoting a repressive theology, while others sought to revise marxist models in line with changes in the global economy [Green Anarchist, No. 34].¹¹ Similarly Class War, Subversion and Working Class Times have engaged in epistolary debates over identifying and categorising the working class.¹² Leninist influences on anarchism are also evident. In some of the propaganda emanating from within these class struggle groups in which the revolutionary class, is restricted to preconceived categories based on western industrial, predominantly male workers.¹³ Liberal anarchists, such as Donald Room, also have a distinct view on the appropriate agent of change, regarding it in terms of the abstract rational individual [Room, 1986, 56].

The paradigmatic characterisation of the revolutionary subject and other libertarian conceptions of class are best understood through comparisons with other competing theories from within the socialist camp. As Marx's work has been so widely interpreted, to justify one version, as authentically his against competing exegeses would

1.2. The Decline and Rise of Class Within British Radicalism

In the major libertarian movements, even before the end of the First World War, anarchists surmised that the agent of change was the working class. Libertarians, such as Rocker and Berkman, acknowledged that they were part of the working class who were in a conflict with another class, in a struggle based on competing economic interests. Their writings were based on encouraging class conflict. Ignoring this feature would make their propaganda incomprehensible. As the American syndicalist Elizabeth Gurly Flynn explained in her defence of sabotage to promote economic emancipation: 'If you believe that a point can be reached whereby the worker can get enough, a point of amicable adjustment of industrial warfare and economic distribution, then there is no justification and no explanation of sabotage intelligible to you' [Flynn, 1993, 8]. The division in capitalism between capital and labour is absolute and cannot be reconciled, as incarnated in Cleaver's remark: 'there are always two perspectives, capital's versus the working class's!' [Cleaver, 1979, 64]. Any consequent attempt at an objective social science is dismissed as 'futile'. Claims of universal validity are rejected. The archetypal anarchist position, derived in part from the autonomist tradition to which Cleaver belongs, accepts that capitalism divides subject positions, but does not consider this the only separation.

The contemporary British anarchist groups that are the focus of this study regard themselves as emanating from, and referring to, the 'working class'. This term has many differing interpretations and in the ideal form cannot be specified apart from the context of oppression, although some groups like the SPLAT collective profess to have very clear universal demarcations for class.¹⁵ The identifying features of the libertarian ideal (prefiguration, rejection of both capitalism and hierarchy) can be reinterpreted in terms of the identification, and reaffirmation, of the working class as revolutionary subject, albeit a multiple and diverse concept of 'class'. The agent of change in itself transforms into the (revolutionary) class for itself through the reflexive application of anarchist principles. Examining the constituency that forms the anarchist revolutionary subject also uncovers the libertarian notion of power and assists in understanding the relevance of multiple forms of organisation and tactic that characterises contemporary British anarchism (as covered in the final two chapters).

The main anarchist currents operating in Britain, which identify themselves primarily as anarcho-syndicalists, anarchist-communists, council-communists and autonomous marxists, maintain that the working class is the revolutionary agent of change.¹⁶ This view challenges the dominant interpretation of anarchism that since the 1950s, has often been associated with a position which repudiated this agent. Indeed in some cases, as Fox reports, the ascription of the revolutionary subject has been transferred to groups such as students or dropouts [Fox, 1989, 6]. Similarly in America, as Cleaver describes, the New Left identified only particular parts of the working class as the agent for change, namely the lumpenproletariat and third world peasantry [Cleaver, 1979, 26].

Others went further by explicitly or implicitly rejecting class analysis altogether [Black and Green, No. 2/3, Fall/Winter 1981-2, 24].¹⁷ This rejection is deemed by class-based opponents to be little short of liberalism. Revolutionary anarchist groups felt that their movement had been contaminated with 'liberal and leftist ideas' which had come about through a 'lack of theory and class based analysis' [Organise! No. 36, 16]. While Ward and the Freedom group have often been accused of helping to create British reformist anarchism, others have been much more charitable [Meltzer, 1976a, 32; Krimerman & Perry, 1966, 386].

The perceived downturn in the utopian promise of 1960s class struggle in the following decade (which reached its nadir when the Iranian Revolution ended in theocracy) led to an exodus of radicals into the then more cosseted world of academia. A migration that led to a revival in class analysis amongst critical and cultural theorists. The reinvigoration of class analysis had its heyday with the promulgation of Gramscian and Althusserian marxist revisions of communism by (amongst others) the Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies (now the Department of Cultural Studies) at Birmingham University.¹⁸ Yet this interest in class has also gone into decline. The near absence of radical concerns in recent years can be partly explained by the decreased interest by the new student population, who have grown up under Thatcherism and Blairism and been enfeebled by loans and debt, who consequently desire a more career-minded curriculum. The elitist forms of socialism promulgated from the university setting exacerbated this downturn in militancy. It made few connections to the supposed agent of change, and concentrated on a staid vision of the working class as predominantly white and male, which dealt only superficially and often patronisingly with other concerns. The increase in popularity of post-structuralist critics who stress the divisions and inconsistencies within unifying identities, and the viability of other discourses based on gender or race, has further questioned the relevance of programmes which operate on class terms alone.

There has been a corresponding decrease in the popularity of revolutionary groups on the orthodox left which worked along simple binary class oppositions. Militant (now the Socialist Party), the Workers Revolutionary Party and the Communist Party who used to count their members in thousands and their supporters in the tens of thousands, have either folded or been reduced to groupings with memberships counted in dozens.¹⁹ In the anarchist movement in Britain, the opposite trend has occurred. Since 1984, the main egalitarian libertarian groupings have grown in size, while the pacifist-liberal tradition prominent in the 1960s have gone into decline. Even the environmental movement, which has been portrayed as the meeting point for many activists who reject class struggle [McKay, 1998, 46] actually includes substantial groupings, such as the militant British sections of Earth First! who recognise the importance of class.²⁰

It would be simplistic to see British anarchism's return to revolutionary socialist preoccupations with class as a result solely of the aggressive policies of the Thatcher governments (1979-90). Some commentators have cited the main industrial landmarks of these administrations, the Miners' Strike (1984-5) and the Wapping Dispute (1986) as the impetus for this change in direction [Class War, 1992, 167; Fox, 1989, 7].²¹ Although this account of the extension of class analysis within British anarchism captures some important features of the dynamics of anarchist discourse, it is not wholly satisfactory.

Viewing the Miners' Strike as the central cause for the restoration of class in British anarchism risks overlooking the significant class struggle groups (Syndicalist Workers Federation, Anarchist Workers Association and Black Flag) which existed even in the more consensual political epochs. These too faced moments of expansion and decline prior to the appearance of the New Right. Class War itself had chosen its descriptive, combative name prior to the Miners' Strike. Even amongst those that did not employ classic marxist terminology, and even claimed to have superseded it, there was still a similar view of agency to that promulgated by contemporary class-struggle groups [Anti-Mass Methods of Organisation for Collectives, 1988]. Many egalitarian anarchists in the 1980s were hesitant to employ overtly class terms because such language had strong associations with the totalitarian Soviet States and their advocates in Britain. State socialists had defined themselves as Marxist and claimed a pre-eminent status as representatives of the global proletariat using the discourse of class struggle. The discourse of class struggle was identified with hierarchical, state socialism, as an article in Class War's Heavy Stuff journal explains: 'The more talk of class struggle the more Stalinist' [Rhys, 1988e, 26].

Soviet-style states were defined by the anarchist movement from 1921-onward (and by some before that) as having an authoritarian and elitist social order, little different to that of the capitalist states.²² In order to distance themselves from these movements many anarchists sought to avoid the terminology associated with the Soviet tyrannies and consciously or not, they resisted employing a vocabulary associated with class analysis. With the decline of the Stalinist parties, and the relative upsurge of interest in anarchism, there was greater confidence in reclaiming this discourse for libertarian revolutionary purposes. Starker expressions of class enmity were also found to be useful in shaking off the liberal influences on British radical politics [Bone, 1986, 2].²³

2. Leninist Model of Class

While the archetypal anarchist notion of class developed here differs from that of the traditional marxist notion of class, this simple binary opposition still has its adherents within British libertarianism. Marx defines the class position as depending on the relationship to the means of production [Marx, 1977, 41], a view that is shared by libertarians such as Subversion [Subversion (unnumbered) No. 12e, 14]. In orthodox marxism the workers engage in daily struggle with capital, pursuing higher wages and better conditions while capitalism aims to maximise profits by lowering pay and benefits. It is this contradiction which is central to traditional marxism. Anarchists accept that although this economic conflict is an important aspect of class it is not the only one [Class War, 1992, 86].

For traditional (Leninist) marxists such as Chris Harman,²⁴ priority is given to the industrial working class. For Harman, the social agent capable of achieving communism is only found in the modern conditions of Western industrialised states. It is only here that the working class can be gathered together in sufficient numbers to form cohesive organisations and develop its collective strength.

[L]ife under capitalism prepares workers in many ways to take control of society. For example, capitalism needs workers who are skilled and educated. Also capitalism forces thousands of people into huge workplaces in huge conurbations where they are in close contact with one another, and where they can be a powerful force for changing society [Harman, 1979, 38].

As Marx explained, each historical era is marked by particular modes of production, such as feudalism or capitalism, which have specific relations of production. These relations and modes of production create the 'mode of production of material life' or superstructure which is the 'general process of social, political and intellectual life' [Marx, 1992, 425]. Social conflict and revolution takes place when the productive forces come into conflict with the existing social relations, for instance when emerging capitalism came into conflict with the laws and political process of the preceding period of aristocracy. What is particular about the era of industrial capitalism is that it is only in this epoch that there is sufficient affluence for restrictive modes of production to be redundant and for an agent to be formed that can create communism [Marx, 1992, 426]. The historically specific feature of Marx's materialism is examined below. What is concentrated upon in this sub-section is the role of the industrial worker as being uniquely qualified for the task of liberation.

There are two unique characteristics that distinguish the proletariat as the revolutionary subject. The modes of production specific to the industrial period require a geographical concentration of the workforce in a disciplined fashion. The second is that technical means have been formed to cross national frontiers so that the working class can combine. Modern capitalism, for Harman, provides the potential international revolutionary force. Additionally, as will be discussed below, capitalism not only reduces labourers from selling the products of their labour to selling just their labour power, but further immiserates them, as the imperatives for maximisation of surplus labour (profits) reduces wages. This classical model of marxism has a strategic implication: There is one central problematic, i.e. the resolution of economic class

The forces of production create new social relations through conflict with current social relations. In other epochs the tension between the two have lead to the transformation of serfdom to liberal citizenship, and it is only in the modern epoch that the transition to socialism is possible. Technical progress has to be supported to promote the development of capitalism so that the material conditions for communism can come into being [Harman, 1979, 16]. Consequently Harman considers the industrial worker created by capitalism to be the revolutionary subject. In this he follows Lenin: '[T]he proletariat is the only class that is consistently revolutionary, the only class able to unite all the working and exploited people in the struggle against the bourgeoisie, in completely replacing it' [Lenin, 1976, 30]. Only the proletariat have this historic mission.

Indeed it is specifically the industrial working class that is capable of the transformation into communism. Colleagues of Harman, such as Tony Cliff, explain that the authoritarian turn of Lenin's Bolsheviks was as a result of an insufficiently large working class in Russia. A large proletariat was required to gain power over other classes, including the peasantry. Without it the Communist Party had to substitute its rule for that of the numerically weak proletariat [Cliff, 1996, 61-2].²⁵ Cliff maintains that agricultural workers are not revolutionary subjects.

Harman's version of historical materialism ascribed to Marx by Andre Gorz²⁶ and libertarians such as ²⁵ Cliff acknowledges that the difference between Leninists, such as himself, and anarchists and Social Revolutionaries is that the latter do not distinguish between workers and peasants [Cliff, 1996, 60].

²⁶ Gorz claims that this is the most common reading

Wildcat restricts the communist agent of change to a particular epoch, that of industrial capitalism.²⁷ The anarchist archetype agent has similarities with the founding axiom of primitivism, according to which there has always been sufficient abundance for a libertarian form of society. Leninists, such as Harman, prioritise the current epoch because, they argue, it is only now that the capitalist relations of production have generated sufficient economic surplus to create socialism. The proletariat for Harman are in a unique epoch in which they are no longer constrained by scarcity and have no material interest in the continuation of this pattern of production [Harman, 1979, 38].

According to Thomas, it is Marx's prioritising of the proletariat over other sections of the working class which distinguished his views from Bakunin [Thomas, 1980, 291]. As the ACF comment, Bakunin saw the revolution emanating from: 'The overthrow of one oppressing class by another oppressed class [...] The oppressed class [...] he variously described as commoners, the people, the masses or the workers...' [ACF, 1991e, 2]. Because anarchists hold to a broader view of the working class, which includes the lumpenproletariat, they have been accused of promoting this section above others. However, all anarchists did was reject the orthodox marxist exclusion of the non-industrial working class.

The emphasis upon the industrial workforce, which is not unique to Leninists, is so great that the term 'working class' appears to be synonymous with 'industrial labour'. For instance, the health and size of the working class has often been reduced to of Marx ascribed to by the radicals of 1968 [Gorz, 1997, 20].

questions concerning the size and influence of industrial and trade labour unions [Gorz, 1997, 154; Gilroy, 1991, 18]. Other socialist theorists amongst them Gorz and post-marxists Ernesto Laclau & Chantal Mouffe have questioned this privileging of the industrial proletariat. Anarchists as diverse as the primitivists and class based libertarians such as the ACF and Sam Dolgoff also dismiss this emphasis on the industrial worker, for amongst other reasons, providing succour to capitalism and presenting a Eurocentric geography for struggle.

Libertarians such as Dolgoff consider the orthodox marxist view of historical progress to be inaccurate. They ascribe to Marx the proposition that when material productive forces (technology and industrial organisation) are constrained by the social relations of production, a revolutionary situation comes about. Traditional marxism therefore requires the development of these conditions and hence supports for the bourgeoisie to enhance productive capacity. As a consequence, libertarian forms of peasant and artisan struggle in underdeveloped countries and in non-industrial epochs are rejected by Leninists in favour of supporting capitalist domination so that an industrial working class is formed [Dolgoff, 1989e, 20]. Economic determinist versions of history have Eurocentric repercussions, as the arena of revolutionary struggle is deemed to be in those areas that are most industrialised, namely Western Europe and North America. It also leads to British Leninists supporting the developing bourgeois movements in the colonial and post-colonial nations not only against the colonial and post-colonial powers but also against the local peasantry [Harman, 1979, 54 & Organise!, No. 21, 5-6].

In contrast to the above view, libertarians (especially but not exclusively the primitivists,) hold that any historic epoch has had sufficient

...communism to develop. Drawing on the research of Marshall Sahlins, Kropotkin and the writings of John Zerzan and Fredy Perlman,²⁸ they propose that 'resistance to civilisation has always had the potential to lead to the global community' [Wildcat No. 17, 11].²⁹ What is unique about the current situation is that local libertarian enclaves are more quickly overrun by the expansion of oppressive forces [Wildcat No. 17, 13]. Moreover, the globalization of the industrial economy means that in any case most modes of production increasingly fall within the framework of capitalism [Autonomous Plenum of Southern Germany, 1987, 30].

The prioritisation, by Leninists, of the proletariat over other sections of the working class was not only fundamentally mistaken but also effectively repressive as it assisted in the development of the capitalist mode of domination. Conflicts before the industrial era, involving artisans, peasants and dissenters could have been taken to free communist conclusions. According to the anarchist conception, revolutionary subjects are not confined to a particular historic epoch, nor to the arena of production alone. As capitalism extends globally, the social conditions needed to increase surplus value also extend beyond the site of manufacture, a view endorsed by autonomists and situationists.

There are a few anarchists who share the simple binary model of orthodox marxism, yet there are others still, on the edges of the movement who overtly reject any form of historical materialism³⁰

²⁸ See Kropotkin's Mutual Aid (1939), Sahlins' Stone-Age Economics (1972) and Perlman's Against History Against Leviathan (1983)

³⁰ Historical materialism is the view that the preferring an idealist, mystical explanation of events which escapes the hold of the rational.³¹ Differences arise between traditional marxists and the archetypal anarchists. The latter accept that changes in society have a materialist basis but they also regard certain features that are considered by their orthodox socialist opponents to be merely products of the forces of production as sufficiently influential to affect these forces and to develop an autonomous dynamic. Orthodox marxists hold that only industrial workers can be agents of liberation, in a particular historical era and that the primary site of conflict is economic in all cases, whereas anarchists have a wider interpretation of oppression and consequently a broader, more complex concept of the agent of change.

The Leninist account restricts the class in itself to a historically specific economically determined group tied to specific social locations. Lenin's account of the transformation of the class in itself into the class for itself has other strategic features. Lenin's immiserated and active working class is incapable of recognising the roots of its own oppression. 'The history of all countries shows that the working class, solely by its own force, is able to work out merely trade-union consciousness.' What is needed is 'consciousness [...] brought to them from outside.' [Lenin, 1963, 62-3]. Lenin's proposition has three important features. First, there is a predetermined state to be reached (an ideal type of consciousness, knowledge of a precise productive basis of society (the forces of production) shapes the relations of production and the culture and politics of that society (the social relations), in contrast to idealism that sees changes in conceptual apparatus and social relations irrespective of material conditions.

³¹ It can often be found in Primitivist writings see Brian Morris's discussion of this in Green Anarchist, No. 36, 13.

type of economic analysis). Second, it is a section of the 'bourgeois intelligentsia' who can know this state independently of those who reach it [Lenin, 1963, 63]. Thirdly, those who need to reach revolutionary consciousness cannot attain it without another external group to guide them (a vanguard). The revolutionary party, as described in the next chapter is, for Leninism, the quintessential catalyst for the change from the class in itself to the class for itself. This organisational structure and the paternalistic ideology which promotes it, is widely seen as leading to the re-establishing of a ruling class in socialist regimes [May, 1994, 23] .

Some anarchists have also considered that there is a considerable distance between the revolutionary class for itself and the subjugated class in itself and like the Leninists have proposed that a revolutionary elite is required to guide, albeit temporarily, the backward sections. The groups organised around The Organisational Platform of Libertarian Communism (The Platform) such as the WSM and particularly the AWG place considerable importance on the role of the revolutionary cadre and organisation in transforming the class in itself into the class for itself. Yet they were criticised by all the other major anarchist currents for this paternalistic intervention.

The anarchist ideal by contrast rejects mediation by others, including even those professing to be revolutionaries. It is the different approaches for the transformative 'class becoming for itself' which distinguishes anarchism in its ideal form from other socialist traditions such as Leninism [Thomas, 1980, 260]. An example comes from Class War's Jon Barr who identifies the Bolshevik Revolution, the pivotal event of contemporary Leninism, as an example of paternalistic rebellion. Barr argues that such bourgeois insurrection is not liberation, as the oppressed themselves were not in control of the process of change but had it done for them, so the revolution could only lead to the re-creation of class society [Barr, 1991, 5-6].³²

Anarchists are not condemned to inactivity. Class struggle libertarians who come from oppressed subject groups can consequently act for their own liberation by acting in an anti-hierarchical manner in confronting disciplining practices. Anarchists from outside these subjugated identities cannot directly intervene in these struggles in a liberatory manner.³³ However, co-operative networks of support between subjugated groups can form where mutual areas of struggle are recognised. For instance trade unionists, workplace activists, ravers and travellers came together to create libertarian networks of common support to confront the 1994 Criminal Justice Bill, as it affected all these different groups. Inside and alongside these groups were sections of the community who had already withstood harm inflicted by the administration that was proposing the new legislation.

The act of the oppressed co-operating under the specific context of their subjugation provides the motivation for widespread solidarity between subject groups. The class in itself becomes for itself by acknowledging a prefigurative application of libertarian principles. Self-valorization manifests itself in tactics which avoid hierarchical relations (such as, but not uniquely, capitalism) as well as representation, which tends towards the recreation of oppressive structures, and creates new grounds for solidarity with other oppressed groups. It is through the process of confrontation that forms of oppression become recognised and solutions sought. The process of struggle generates new forms of resistance and new identities for the agents of change that cannot be predicted in advance. The events of May 1968 brought out into the open the forms of domination obscured by Leninist conceptions of class and nationalist conflicts. Comradeship in struggle creates new identities for the agents of change.

3. Gorz and the Non-Class

It is appropriate to discuss the theory of Gorz at this point because he, like the anarchists, also rejected the authoritarianism of the Second International marxism (Leninism). In his book Farewell to the Working Class, Gorz argues against 'Marx' (a Marx understood through a Leninist reading).³⁴ This text, originally published at the start of the 1980s, sought to find an appropriate agent for libertarian transformation which acknowledged the changes wrought to society. The growth in production due to microelectronics and information technology is considered to have fundamentally derailed the socialist project [Conway, 1987, 132].³⁵ Gorz outlines Marx's account of capitalist forces of production developing particular forms of class and class antagonism [Gorz, 1997, 19]. He identifies the key features of Marx's proletariat, as immiseration, functional capability and nascent organisational strength and prefigurative habits. The multi-skilled proletariat was the unique revolutionary class for Marx because it had the complex competencies to operate the technology of modern capitalism but, was denied sovereignty over the machinery by capitalist relations of production [Gorz, 1997, 24-5 & 66].

Gorz points out that the proletariat no longer has the historically specific features ascribed to it by marxists. De-skilling caused by automation and the wide distribution of the workforce co-ordinated by heteronomous management has meant that the features ascribed to a uniquely revolutionary class no longer apply. Technical expansion has permanently affected the role of the marxist subject, the skilled, mass worker work has become dispersed, and less prone to union discipline. The western industrialised workforce have a relatively high standard of living and thus for those who accept the immiseration thesis, the proletariat are no longer in vital need for revolutionary change [Gorz, 1997, 68-9]. Instead Gorz recognises the characteristics of the revolutionary subject in a new neo-proletariat, 'the non-class'.

Automated capitalism has produced a new non-class. The non-class results from the transformation in the job market. They are a group of individuals who have acquired interchangeable skills through the necessity of flexibility in the job markets. However, this group has also experienced long periods of unemployment and has not been domesticated by the industrial process. They are a 'non-class' because they no longer have class allegiance to the production process and consequently, for Gorz, no class identity [Gorz, 1997, 66, 68]. This increase in leisure time means that the non-class is not marked by capitalist modes of production, and consequently they maintain their autonomy and creativity. As such, they prefigure a new society liberated from alienated labour [Gorz, 1997, 11 & 75].

There are a number of criticisms to be made of Gorz's thesis from a libertarian perspective. Firstly, by designating the non-class instead of the industrial proletariat as the revolutionary agent, he repeats the Leninist (or in Gorz's view 'marxist') problem of relying on a purely economic category and consequently seeing resistance in strategic terms. Secondly, Gorz merely inverts Marx's hierarchy. Marx classifies the long term jobless as part of the lumpenproletariat a reactionary sub-class rather than a vanguard non-class. By contrast Gorz creates a taxonomy in which the mantle of revolutionary vanguard goes to those capable of the refusal to work. A lower place is given to those positioned for industrial militancy [Marx & Engels, 1977, 47]. While some regard dropping out as the primary site for activity [F., Subversion No. 23, 10-11] others reject this prioritisation.³⁶ Anarchists, unlike Marx, do not dismiss the unemployed as part of the working class but similarly, in accordance with the ideal, reject identifying one section as the universal class [Class War, 1992, 57-58].

The working class (including the pool of surplus labour) in the economic sector are the only ones in this context who can reject work. In the context of other struggles the unemployed are those best suited to act. In the campaigns against the further harassment of social security claimants through the invasive Job Seekers Allowance (JSA), the unemployed were seen by anarchists as the primary agents of change. Disagreements grew between libertarians and the Leninist left in the anti-JSA campaigns because the latter still regarded the unionised staff who were instrumentally applying the new regulations as the agent of change, rather than the unemployed who were directly affected by the benefit changes [Counter Information No. 47, 1; Subversion No. 20, 12-4; Organise! No. 48, 6 & 12]. Like the proletariat, the unemployed are subjected to a role predetermined by capitalism, so they too can find methods of resistance in which they play the leading role. As there are similarities of experience and interest with other economically oppressed groups the unemployed can find links of solidarity. But it is not only the unemployed or the industrial manual working class who are the potential agents of change. Transformations in technology create new types of workforce subject to their own forms of oppression as well as those shared by other employees.

4. The Processed World

The revolutionary agent of anarchism extends beyond the Leninist model of the proletariat and Gorz's non-class. Recent class-struggle libertarians from America, such as those behind Processed World magazine, and those in Britain such as Aufheben, have acknowledged that oppressive circumstances and resistance to these conditions occur in a wide range of economic activities, not only in large scale heavy industries.³⁷ No oppressed group is the universal vanguard; that is to say that there is no central struggle of the working class that can be universalised across all contexts. Meaningful opposition is not specific to particular groups of the oppressed but can include the service and information sector as well as the unemployed and the industrial workforce. Further, like the anarchist ideal, Processed World illustrates the importance of local context. As technical advances are made in pursuit of surplus labour, occupations within the technological industries alter in their abilities to infringe on the lives of others. As oppressive practices extend or are contained so too new subject identities are formed and these new subjects discover their own innovative methods. A universal distinction between clerical and manual labour or between rural and urban worker is unsustainable, as both are subject to alienating conditions. Although employees in different areas face their own particular forms of oppression, there can be as many areas of similarity between different sectors as within them. For instance, a manual labourer unpacking goods in a bookstore may be subject to the same managerial surveillance as a clerk or computer operator in the same (or even other) employment front(s).

The restructuring of capitalism has altered class positions, but while there has been a well-documented embourgeoisement within certain occupations, such as the increasingly managerial role of Employment Service staff mentioned above, and in trends in consumption, there has been a countervailing process of proletarianisation. Technical and white-collar work, which previously had high degrees of autonomy and high status, has been reduced in standing. Increased surveillance and control of such work, abetted by technological change which makes such labour open to a wider section of the labour market, has brought many technicians into the general pool of labour [Witheyford, 1994, 95].³⁸ Certain occupations are

Once considered a career that required a good deal of skill, the clerical job now closely resembles an assembly line station. Office management has consciously applied the principles of scientific management to the growing flow of paper and money, breaking the process down into components, routinizing and automizing the work, and reserving the more 'mental' tasks for managers or the new machines [Carlsson, 1990, 59].

constituted by more chaotic power shifts, combining, momentarily, managerial and workers' roles, in what Class War identify as a 'grey area' [Class War, 1992, 82]. Processed World describes the subtle graduations in office hierarchy, combined with informal networks of influence that effect the power roles of individual employees. These networks are in a constant process of change [Carlsson, 1990, 59-60 & 152]. An employee can be carrying out managerial ('order-giving') and working class ('order-taking') roles, depending on context, with hierarchies that constantly readjust and reform. Libertarian confrontations with repressive practices aim to resist the creation of other structures of dominance. In a particular location, different heteronomous powers combine, such as sexism and class oppression. To confront only one form of oppression may assist the expansion of the other. Proletarian Gob declares that efforts to create equal representation of genders for High Court judges would be an assault on a specific manifestation of patriarchy, yet would leave class (and other managerial) divisions intact, if not strengthened. Those who would still be oppressed by the amended judiciary would not be behaving prefiguratively in assisting the revision of their domination [Proletarian Gob, 1993, 7].³⁹

The fluidity of managerial power is illustrated by changes in the status of the teaching profession. The authoritarianism of many aspects of education has long been a subject of libertarian critique stretching back to such influences on anarchism as Godwin and Rousseau, through to Ivan Illich and Paulo Friere. Contemporary libertarian revolutionaries such as the Andersons condemn teachers as part of the dominant class and denounce the professional elite status of its practitioners. Teachers, the Anderson's explain in an article originally published in 1988⁴⁰, have a high degree of autonomy which is exercised in the disciplinarian control of children in order to train them for work [Anderson & Anderson, 1998, 48-50]. However, teaching has undergone substantial changes, as Subversion note. They recognise that while teachers do play a repressive role, the lowering of their status due to less autonomy in the class room over course topics and materials (with the introduction of the National Curriculum) and greater surveillance of their activities, has proletarianised certain fundamental features of their work [Subversion No. 7, 10-11; No. 11, 11].⁴¹ Consequently, unlike the Andersons, Subversion accepts that there are aspects of the teachers' employment struggles that can be supported as they represent, in specific contexts, aspects of a libertarian class struggle.

The archetypal anarchist position also considers significant those sections of the workforce dismissed by Leninism as extraneous to the revolutionary struggle. Rural, white collar and the unemployed are not only capable of resisting oppressive practices, but in certain localities they are the only ones capable of carrying out libertarian direct action. The ideal paradigm also extends beyond economic relations. However, before examining this aspect of anarchism's conception of the agents of change, it is important to show how their understanding of the revolutionary identity extends outside the realm of immediate production and labour.

5. Extension of Class: The Social Factory

The autonomist critique of Leninism concerned the latter's concentration on production in the workplace, whereas for autonomists the point of production is not the sole site for the extraction of surplus labour. All aspects of social life are commodified in pursuit of greater profit. Consequently not only the factory worker, but also those who prepare the worker for production, through housework, education and upbringing are part of the production process [Dalla Costa, 1975, 34 & 26]. All those subjected to capital's need for greater consumption, constitute the working class ('the socialised worker') [Witheyford, 1994, 95]. Maria Dalla Costa includes all those involved in productive labour from which a surplus can be drawn. So class struggle also extends beyond employee/employer struggles in the industrial setting.⁴² As areas of leisure become subject to capitalist relations and priorities of profit, culture itself becomes an arena for class struggle. This extension of capitalist relations has altered the terms and terrain of class struggle, but not eradicated it [Cleaver, 1979, 57]. The situationists refer to the subjection of leisure and communication to capitalist modes of production, distribution and exchange as 'the spectacle'.

The tendency by Leninists is to regard class as being primarily located at the industrial or productive sites. Writers like Gorz regret that the industrial workforce is no longer the vanguard capable of eradicating the basis for repressive social relations. In contrast anarchists ascribe a pre-eminent role to proletarians only in facing specific industrial practices, while regarding workers in other contexts as potential agents of change. The anarchists' notion of struggle does not rely on a centralised strategy, but conceives the arena tactically arranged along multifaceted, interconnected webs of oppression [May, 1994, 7-12]. The whole class faces alienating conditions, not just at work, but within its daily social relations.

Castoriadis [Cardan], whose group and journal Socialisme ou Barbarie had a large influence on contemporary British libertarians, especially Solidarity,⁴³ reformulated the class question not in terms of ownership of the means of production, but in terms of control of production, thereby switching the focus from exploitation to alienation. The central contradiction was of workers being objectified by bureaucratic capitalism although the system of administration requires worker participation in order to renew and develop such management. Castoriadis's reworking of the dynamics of capitalist oppression revolved around the notions of bureaucratic management ('order-givers') and the executants ('order-takers') [Cardan, 1975e, 11 <18>]. The contradiction manifests itself in production but increasingly, like the autonomists, into all aspects of social life. For Aufheben, Castoriadis' revision was not an overhaul of Marx. The autonomists interpret Marx as having detected that capital accumulation requires both the transformation of people into objects, thus reducing their autonomy, and that profitable production needs the active participation and ingenuity of the workforce. Castoriadis's modification of Marx does not replace capital's drive to accumulate but is just another aspect of it [Aufheben, No. 3, 25-6]. The autonomist interpretation of Marx differs from the Second International readings favoured by Gorz and Harman.

For Castoriadis, what links the working class is not the same experience of industrial work, as in Harman's revolutionary subject, but the same feature of being reduced from subject to an object by capitalism [Cardan, 1975e, 9 <14>]. Thus, Gorz's non-class is not uniquely privileged, as all order-takers are potential revolutionary subjects. All those in Class War's analysis who are 'told what to do', those subjected to power, are the working class [Class War, 1992, 58]. 'Order giving' is contextual: an employee in one situation is subjected to managerial control in another uses and maintains such routines of bureaucracy.

Similarly, the economic well being of sections of the industrial working class does not prevent them from participating in a potentially revolutionary position. Their status as skilled workers makes them essential to the success of the social transformation, along with other sections of the working class, while the shared experience of alienation, even if of an increasingly spectacular kind, still provides the vital need for change. The situationist Raoul Vaneigem satirises the type of argument put forward by Gorz:

We hear from some quarters that in the advanced industrial countries the proletariat no longer exists, that it has disappeared forever under an avalanche of sound systems, colour TVs, water-beds, two-car garages and swimming pools. Others denounce this as a sleight of hand and indignantly point out a few remaining workers whose low wages and wretched conditions do undeniably evoke the nineteenth century. [Vaneigem, 1983, 48]

This is not to say that the material conditions of the working class are unimportant. Capital and wealth provide one form of power and as John Casey, then of Class War notes, this is one reason to support pay rises for the working class [Casey, 1989e, 18]. More important than actual wealth are the nexus of interrelated forms of power, of which wealth is but one, where people can influence the lives of others or impose heteronomous forms of governance, such as that of capital. Class War refer to this network of forces as 'social power' [Class War, 1992, 58].

The revision of marxism offered by Castoriadis and the situationists concerns itself with how economic oppression leads to the extension of capital relations into all aspects of life creating servitude amongst abundance. Heteronomous power is now identified throughout a bricolage of social relations rather than directly through economic relations. The historical-context which lead to the development of the Castoriadis-Situationist thesis of growing wealth of the working class (especially in the West), has altered in recent years with evidence showing that in Britain from 1979-93 the economically disadvantaged became significantly worse off.⁴⁴ Despite the change in economic circumstances the relevance of the extension of oppressive forces into all aspects of social life remains pertinent.

Traditional marxism assigned strategic importance to the economic base over the superstructure whereas anarchism perceives a reciprocal relationship between them.⁴⁵ The class struggle extends into the community and cultural arenas as well as the economy. This expanded notion of capitalism, also extends the category of the working class, and therefore the potential revolutionary subject. For anarchists, all those who are subjugated by capitalism to contribute to the extract surplus labour in the whole of the social factory are working class, whether it be in the industrial sector, or in the preparation and reproduction of capital relations, in domestic, social and cultural life. Consequently, the working class includes the proletariat but also the non-class, domestic labourers, white-collar employees and school students [Class War, 1992, 58-9]

The central feature and problem of this form of analysis, as May submits, is that capital still remains central and anti-capitalist conflict the key struggle, even if the sites of this warfare extend beyond the industrial and workplace arenas [May, 1994, 44-5 & 54-5]. The weakness, however, is that this analysis risks reductivism. The ACF acknowledge this flaw and suggest that some forms of oppression, such as gender and racial power, pre-date capitalism. Groups that maintain a strategic conception of struggle, with one source of oppressive power, namely capitalism, consider divisions of race, gender and sexuality to be superstructural. These struggles threaten to lessen class unity and therefore should be rejected on those grounds alone. This can lead to three types of responses. The first two are strategic - either to be concerned about discriminatory practices only when they affect the working class (like Proletarian Gob);⁴⁶ or to regard any sexist or racist behaviour as encouraging class divisions [Class War, No. 51, 9]. A third response, compatible with the ideal, regards capital relations to be dominant in most contexts, but not as the sole organising force. This third response recognises that capitalism interacts with other forms of oppressive practices that may not be wholly reducible to economic activity. Here different subjugated identities are formed and it is these agents that must take the leading role. However, as capitalism is still a significant factor economic liberation must also be a necessary feature.

The criticisms of class analysis are a feature of the wider anarchist movement who have often commented on what is excluded from these formulations, in particular those agents who do not identify with, or fall outside of the subject class. McKay cites those activists who consider themselves middle class as examples of those excluded [McKay, 1998, 19 & 44; Monibot, 1998, 181]. He holds that environmental activism exceeds the remit of class, where wider social movements hold sway. As will be seen other explanatory traditions, feminism and

Black studies, also maintain that their explanatory frameworks are not reducible solely to class terms [Gilroy, 1991, 15-6; Barrett, 1988, 11]. However, the anarchist view of the revolutionary subject has fluid, multiple identities. Liberation involves avoiding reductivist uniformity and instead frees non-hierarchical differences.

6. Ethnicity, Gender and Sexuality

The anarchist concept of the revolutionary subject extends beyond the proletarian categories of Leninism. It includes those in mass production, but also involved in other forms of industry and preparatory labour. It also comprises those subjected to capitalist demands in their leisure and living conditions. Nonetheless these accounts, shared by some class struggle anarchists, have been strategic in that the oppressive forces are thought to emanate from one source, namely capitalism. The question of whether all forms of oppression, such as racism, homophobia and patriarchy, have a single origin in capitalism for anarchism has often been an undisclosed or contradictory feature in much of their propaganda. Many contemporary groupings from within the class struggle tradition reject a strategic position for capitalism and are close to the post-structuralist ideal.

Early British radical publications such as the indigenous newssheet The Worker portrayed the traditional anti-semitic caricatures associated with such luminaries as Proudhon, Bakunin and Fourier [Fishman, 1975, 109].⁴⁷ However, British anarchists past and present have been active in campaigns against discrimination, whether in groups dominated by refugee East European Jewry, led by Rocker, or temporarily in groups such as Anti-Fascist Action (AFA). Similarly the complimentary influences of anarchism and feminism were due to the recognition by anarchists of the 1970s and 1980s that self-organisation is required to prevent paternalism. This meant support for autonomous women's and black groupings, for where racism and sexism existed it was primarily, but not exclusively, up to those excluded to determine the appropriate forms of resistance. In Britain there were close working relationships between women's and anarchist groups, as well as the formation of active anarchy-feminist sections.⁴⁸

Some British anarchists differ from the ideal as although they recognise that wage-labour is not the only form of oppression, these other forms of hierarchy are often seen as still emanating from a single source, the economic modes and relations of production. Earlier groups such as the Anarchist Workers Association (AWA) in 1977 had explained in their 'Aims and Principles' that sexism and racism were results of capitalist forms of production and exchange. 'The class nature of society is reflected in all the dominant philosophies: class, race, sexual, social and personal relationships. The class relationships are expressed through all social relationships and generates attitudes such as racism and sexism' [Anarchist Worker, April 1977, No. 34, 7]. The dynamics of capitalism initiate the other forms of oppression. These are sometimes seen as epiphenomenal (by-products) of capitalism, as having a separate dynamic to economic forces. Big Flame for instance cite the way racial and sexual ideologies, generated to protect the economic interests of an elite, adversely effect the drive for surplus which they were originally brought about to promote [Big Flame, 1991, 7-8].

Nonetheless, the strategic strands of anarchism see economic forces as the primary cause of sexism, and this single site is the strategic place for confronting oppressive powers.

The struggle against sexual oppression is integral to the struggle against the whole of this society, i.e. the class struggle. There is little class unity, while sexism is a force in the working class.

[....] Feminism seeks to emphasise the common interests of woman of all classes at the expense of their class interests. Unless the working class develops and maintains a class analysis of their position in society then they will remain the dupes of the ruling class [Proletarian Gob, 1993, 6].

The Andersons share a similar explanation for the development of racism. They regard it, straightforwardly as a product of capitalist administration: 'In a depraved attempt to justify their atrocities against Africans, several of the middle class managers of the trade widely publicised the profound lie that Africans were sub-normal heathens with an inherent inferiority' [Anderson & Anderson, 1998, 72].

The radical feminist Valerie Solanas also saw social conflict as a simple strategic between two distinct opposing forces, in her view a battle between male and female. Inferior, incomplete, biologically inadequate, dominating maleness is in conflict with that which he lacks, the female attributes, genetically and psychologically [Solanas, 1991]. In this form of feminism, which is not unique to Solanas, other expressions of exploitation are extensions of this gender opposition.⁴⁹ Class and gender binary oppositions have been subject to a number of fierce critiques because of their reductivism. Ryan comments that such attempts to impose on heterogeneous social struggles a single political determinant, which are applied universally regardless of context, are metaphysical. This is because such explanations refer back to a fundamentally unknowable origin. The imposition of a single dominant viewpoint on struggles leads to Leninist forms of organisation [Ryan, 1989, 198-9; May, 1994, 20-1]

Dalla Costa's attempt at resolving the division between gender and class opposition through extending the definition of the agent of change from the industrial worker across to all those involved in production and reproduction, nevertheless still remains reductivist. This is because 'feminist struggle [...] is assimilated within the working class movement' [Weeks, 1998, 76]. The stretching of the term 'class' to reapply it to a feminist concerns is considered by Kathi Weeks to lose the specificity of its explanatory force as well as reducing feminist analysis to a sub-set of marxism [Weeks, 1998, 75]. Weeks is right to be wary of attempts to subsume other identities into economic classifications. The efforts of Leninists to contain other agents of resistance are part of their strategy of directing opposition. The autonomist critique of Leninism does not avoid the ascription of pre-eminence to the economic, yet Dalla Costa's work does indicate the multiplicity of class identities without reducing the precision of class analysis.

Many anarchist activists become aware of oppression through direct experience of capitalist authority. As a result there has been a tendency to continue to use terms like 'class' to identify the origins of oppression even when they may not be wholly economic or when the structures of reification are too well hidden to be accurately articulated. The domination of Leninism has meant a foreshortening of the vocabulary of explanation. Terms such as 'class' are used to describe forms of domination that may not be wholly (or predominantly) economic in origin. The use of a singular category (and one with its origins in economic analysis) leads to an inadvertently inaccurate designation of the agent of change and the imposition of the direction of solidarity, a situation incompatible with anti-representation.

Yet, the category is meant to indicate multiplicity. A post-structural reading of the anarchist notion of 'class' propounds a positive reclamation of urban conflict from the exclusive categories of 1980s identity politics that saw Black struggles as distinct and separate from other forms of conflict [Turner, 1993e, 38] (fig. 3.1.). It attempts to avoid analysing events through a singular category of oppression as this leads to missing important specificities, as recognised by Gilroy. Conflicts such as the urban riots of 1981 and 1985 are represented as racial in character while empirical evidence suggests that the main participants were not distinguished by racial origin [Gilroy, 1991, 32]. An anarchist analysis, like Gilroy's criticisms of the reports of the riots, indicates how the uprisings were misrepresented as resulting from a singular (racial) source of oppression [Smith, Tucker et. al., 1982, 5]. Urban conflicts whose actors were predominantly from ethnic minorities, such as the Los Angeles riots of 1992 were popularly caricatured as race riots. Anarchists too understood these clashes differently. Libertarian analysis of these incidents, which were sometimes in the form of reports by participants,⁵⁰ described the conflicts in terms of class struggles against capitalist, rather than in terms of race. This can lead to the objective singular analyses rejected by the ideal [Subversion No. 10, 2-3].⁵¹

Rosemarie Tong identifies a system of analysis that avoids reducing one form of oppression to another. Tong's 'division of labour' account has the same attributes as the archetypal anarchist (but not the Leninist) description of the revolutionary agent.

[A Leninist] class analysis aims to scan the system of production as a whole, focusing on the means and relations of production in the most general terms possible, a division-of-labour analysis pays attention to the individual people who do the producing in society. In other words, a [Leninist] class analysis calls for only the most abstract discussion of the respective roles of the bourgeoisie and the proletariat, whereas a division-of-labour analysis requires a detailed, very concrete discussion of, for example, who gives the orders and who takes them, who does the stimulating work and who does the drudge work, who works the desirable shift and who works the undesirable shift, and who gets paid more and who gets paid less [Tong, 1989, 183-4]

⁵¹ See to the cover of the 'Working Class Fight Back' edition (unnumbered) of Class War (reprinted in Bone, Pullen & Scargill, 1991, 38] which as Nat Turner describes in a critical review of the Class War Federation challenged the identity politics of the 1980s [Turner 1993e, 36]. These often saw Black peoples struggles as distinct to class struggle.

Tong's analysis applies originally to the division of labour in and around the workplace, but her technique can equally be applied across the social factory. Tong recognises that society is a complex web of interacting forces that cannot be entirely disentangled and whose compositions differ between locations, as a result her micro-analytical method is pertinent for locations where race and ethnicity as well as class and gender are significant. [Tong, 1989, 185]. Tong's technique is concordant with approaches identified as specifically anarcha-feminist by Ehrlich, in which localised power relations, whether of class or gender are examined in the local context [Ehrlich, 1981, 130-1]. Tong's method is not complete, for different methods maybe relevant to different contexts. For instance on other terrain it may be necessary to take account of not only the giving and taking of orders, but also of the degree of lassitude that the order-givers have in issuing their directives. This latter task might also require an investigation of the structural processes that lead to the promotion of one individual or group being placed in a position higher up the hierarchy. But Tong's approach does indicate that there are multiple processes at work in creating a repressive social practice and that these alter according to context.

A subjugated class within a specific context may have many different causes, as a result methods of analysis and forms of resistance must be cognizant of the ways that capital relations extend beyond the site of production, and that in some contexts other forms of oppression operate. The term 'working class', in some writings within the class struggle tradition, refers to the myriad oppressed subject positions formed from the nexus of forces that constitute social space. The potentially misleading use of the phrase 'working class' is akin to the employment of the term 'capitalism' to forces which are not solely economic or reducible to the economic but refer to the historical period when the dominant form of production, distribution and exchange are based on capital accumulation. Ideal anarchist class analysis lies in its ability to recognise, locate and contest the forms of power that operate within given situations. Contemporary anarchisms recognises that diffuse forces operate and consequently different subjects take to the fore in opposing these constraints.

The archetypal anarchist analysis of oppression is distinct from the singular oppositions of class proposed by some libertarians such as Proletarian Gob. The libertarian ideal regards other struggles as having a separate dynamics, with sets of relationships which are not reducible to capital relations alone (and in some circumstance capitalism may not be a dominant factor). The ACF for instance notes that patriarchy is not reducible to capitalism as the one predates the latter.

Equally important is the division between the sexes, which first appeared before history and was the blueprint for latter forms of oppression, such as class, race and disability. The ideology of hierarchy is practised in the home, the workplace, the school, indeed in all relationships, for example sexual harassment at work, male violence, women's unpaid domestic labour and exclusion from all major areas of decision-making. Many racial groups also experience intolerable discrimination as seen in apartheid, anti-Semitism and everyday experience of racial minorities in Britain [ACF, 1990e, 1-2].

The ACF and Attack International recognise that gender divisions are not the result of capitalism, even if these boundaries are manipulated by dominant economic classes.⁵² Green Anarchist too is critical of other anarchists, for trying to reduce all forms of oppression to a single origin. '[A]lthough capitalism has deepened certain forms of oppression such as racism and sexism it's a complete lie to see it as being their sole cause' [Green Anarchist, No. 35, 9]. Recognition of other forms of oppression, as well as class conflict is not to reject or relegate class to other determinants, nor to propose simply a dual system of patriarchy and capitalism. Instead the ideal affirms a multiple system in which different oppressive practices maybe situated depending on location, although in certain contexts (maybe most) capitalism is dominant.

Class War, because of its wider membership, has writers promoting contradictory views. On the one hand, there are those who relegate racism and sexism to epiphenomena of capitalism like Gob, for instance: 'anti-racism has to be anti-capitalist by it's [sic] very nature - because that is the source of racism' [Class War No. 51]. On the other hand there are those who consider other forms of oppression, such as patriarchy, as pre-capitalist. Thus sexism occurs across all classes. 'Sexism means the oppression and putting down of women just because we are women, implying we are of lesser importance than men. All women experience this to varying degrees according to what class they live in' [Class War, 1992, 65]. A reconciliation between these two positions is possible, as Class War goes on to explain, in that the economic overcodes pre-capital hegemonic practices: 'While this division etc is the division of power that runs through all these power relationships, and that is the oppression of women. Women are repressed regardless of what class, colour or age they are' [Attack, Attack, Attack, 5].

See too Class War's Sean Reilly: 'the vast bulk of working class women were untouched by feminism but have had to continue to fight in their own way against Capitalism and a sexist society' (original emphasis) [Reilly, 1988e, 6].

predates capitalism and came from religion, it has been used by capitalists for their own end' [Class War, 1992, 65].

The lack of clarity of whether sexism and/or racism is a product of capitalism or existed prior to capitalism and has been subsequently overcoded to suit its (capital's) requirements is repeated throughout anarchist writings. The former Black Panther Lorenzo Kom'boa Ervin is one of the few contemporary libertarians to attempt a critique of anarchism from a black perspective. He, however, also fails to resolve this apparent contradiction. Like the Andersons and Gob he believes that Black oppression has its roots in capitalism. '[I]t is the capitalist bourgeoisie that creates inequality as a way to divide and rule over the entire working class. White skin privilege is a form of domination by Capital over White labour as well as oppressed national labour' [Ervin, 1993, 10]. Yet he also suggests that 'the capitalist used the system of white skin privilege to great effect' [Ervin, 1993, 3] suggesting that racism pre-existed and was incorporated into capitalism. Near the end of his tract Ervin posits another hypothesis that rather than racism being a product of capitalism, capitalism is a product of racism: 'The Capitalist system was created by and is maintained by enslavement and colonial oppression' [Ervin, 1993, 59].

Such confusion is hardly surprising, for activists like Ervin are more concerned with how and in what forms racism and class oppression are experienced in the present context than about discerning their origins, (the latter task is one which may not be possible). Regardless of whether racism has its roots in capitalism, has been generated separate to it or been overcoded into a form of capitalism, what matters for Ervin is the methods for dealing with oppression. Carol Ehrlich determines that the purpose of analysis is to assist in the 'thousands of small battles which go into daily living (and the not so small ones as well)' [Ehrlich, 1981, 116-7]. It is less the origins of subjugation but how it manifests itself in particular terrain and how it can be effectively conquered that is important.

The oppression affecting the Black working class in the West is often different to that of the White working class. Consequently, as the appropriate agents are identified through oppressed subject positions, the agent for change against racism and capitalism is, in this context, the Black working class. Ervin promotes Black working class groups to take the lead in predominantly racist phenomena and the oppressive forces operating in Black localities but promotes a wider confederation of libertarian working class organisations to deal with forms of class oppression [Ervin, 1993, 19-20 & 5]. In the setting of anti-patriarchal actions, women are the agents of change [Attack, Attack, Attack, Attack, 15]; in anti-racist movements, those in subjugated ethnic minorities are the appropriate subjects.⁵³ However, in most contexts discriminatory practices are rarely made up of only one form of oppression, especially as capitalism extends further into all aspects of social life. Black anti-racist struggles have reciprocal relations, in many contexts, with anti-capitalist and white workers confronting state restraints.⁵⁴

Rather than concentrate upon a single locus of repression, anarchist writings see oppression as a result of the wider nexus of power. For example, Sean Reilly of Class War explains that merely dropping out of middle class employment, or squatting in a working class neighbourhood, does not fundamentally alter one's position. The squatter's social power may remain high due to connections with other informal coalitions of influence such as family background or old school connections [Reilly, 1990e]. So too feminist struggles or black resistance that fail to take class into account, those where economic considerations are still relevant, will merely reform capitalism for the benefit of that particular section. A rising bourgeoisie is created to the detriment of working class women and men, white and black [Claudia, 1989e, 24; Erwin, 1993, 12]. The tendency in class struggle anarchism, especially amongst the autonomists, is to see capitalism as the most powerful factor, with economic concerns having greater priority in almost all contexts.⁵⁵ The disposition towards a strategic conception of capitalism in contrast to the tactical approach of the anarchist ideal is partly a hangover of the influence of Leninism and partly a result of the contexts in which contemporary British anarchists have operated. Managerial structures to further extend the search for surplus value are a major dominant factor in most contemporary British situations, especially those where anarchists have been active, such as in strike support and anti-Poll Tax campaigns.

class family who had also been subject to police harassment. NMP began to combine concerns of race with those of class [Black Flag No. 214, 23]. Similarly Gilroy notes how struggles on the basis of race can affect class composition [Gilroy, 1991, 32-5].

⁵⁵ See for instance Aufheben, 1998b, 34

The term 'working class' is a potentially misleading synonym for the oppressed. Such a phrase should not suggest that there is a romantic vision of an essentially moral set of industrious individuals, straining to create the revolution on behalf of others, although there are occasional such sentimental images in Bakunin and Kropotkin. Nor is the frequency of the term standing for 'the oppressed' in anarchism a commitment to an economically reductionist account. The repeated occurrence of the 'working class' is probably due to the fact that anarchists themselves are located in contexts where economic oppression is the main form of domination so consequently workers are the main group(s) capable of making social transformation of a libertarian kind. It is through the oppressed recognising and acting to overthrow hierarchical structures and create in their place egalitarian social relations that anarchism takes place. In the process of contestation avenues of solidarity open up which provide opportunities to create prefigurative relationships with other subjugated agents.

7. Antagonisms and Solidarity

For the anarchist archetype not all social antagonisms are determined by class oppositions, a view endorsed by Laclau & Mouffe. They reject what they consider to be an essentialist hegemony in which all subjected positions are unified under production and class [Laclau & Mouffe, 1996, 98-9]. In its place Laclau & Mouffe attempt to rebuild a socialist praxis out of the multitude of subjugated positions, whether these are based on class, race, age, sexuality, ethnicity or gender. As there is no irreducible single contradiction, such as that between worker and capital, there is no universal revolutionary subject. Similarly the forms of power and their intersections are in continual flux, often responding to countervailing forms of resistance, so identities and arenas of antagonism are also altering. A form of democratic solidarity is proposed by Laclau & Mouffe where there are temporary equivalences, rather than fixed identities of conflict [Laclau & Mouffe, 1996, 151-3].

These new socialisms, embodied in social forms by the likes of solidarity networks have been promoted by Laclau & Mouffe and, latterly, tweaked by May into a 'post-structuralist anarchism'. It recognises a multiplicity of forces, not reducible to a single unifying cause - that of capitalism for Harman or gender for Solanas, although both are recognised as a major, but not sole, determinants. This post-structuralist libertarianism also warns against the imposition of solidarity from without. Demands that predetermined groups combine recreates a hegemony, as it suggests fixed identities whose interests can be directly known by others. Instead the anarchist archetype suggests that those in the localised subject position discover and create links.

Subversion, for instance criticise the Leninist group Militant for rejecting autonomous organisations of blacks and gays on the grounds that they should be subsumed under a single class based organisation [Subversion unnumbered, No. 12e, 11-2].

A strategic analysis imposes links of solidarity. Where economic class is seen as the sole determinant the working class victims of homophobia are expected to join a proletarian party, which may not be the most appropriate structure for confronting this particular form of oppression. The situationist-inspired Larry Law in his analogy warns against making inappropriate links, such as when superficial similarities are confused with mutually discovered shared interests and desires: '"Don't worry", said the trees when they saw the axe coming, "The handle is one of us"' [Law, 1983, 16].

The archetypal anarchist accepts that in some social forms the economic is subservient to other practices, but this is not to say that it falls to the same criticisms which have befallen Laclau & Mouffe. Best & Kellner noted that Laclau & Mouffe fail to raise the question of whether certain practices and forces are more central in forming the political hegemony and therefore in creating the political identities of those who will transform capitalist society [Best & Kellner, 1991, 202]. For class-struggle anarchists, the reply is still that it depends on context, but that as capitalism extends into more areas of social life, overcoding other oppressive forces, it is this which appears as the dominant power. Correspondingly, even in those contexts where other oppressive practices are dominant, without the inclusion of a critique and response to capitalism the project would not be libertarian as other oppressive forces would remain and become primary.

Similarly the grounds for solidarity for Laclau & Mouffe are far from transparent. For the anarchists all forms of oppressive power must be confronted. To concentrate on just one root of the rhizome would allow others to flourish unchecked. Consequently, anti-sexist struggles which failed to take into account capitalism would merely reform the economic order ensuring traditional class domination [Proletarian Gob, 1993, 7]. Similarly anti-capitalist activity that did not recognise other forms of oppression would recreate hierarchy [Attack, Attack, Attack, Attack, 11].

Post-structuralism concentrates on the micropolitical, where converging local struggles create new forms of resistance. Such opposition is irreducible to a single strategy. As May points out this coheres with many anarchist practices, in particular with direct action, in which the actors affected are the main agents of change. By rejecting a universal, original determinant anarchists cannot universally identify an appropriate agent without recourse to the context. The term 'class' is not reductive in the Leninist sense as it refers to multiple oppressed subject positions, including those where the economic is not dominant. However, contemporary British anarchists would maintain that there were few contexts where capitalism was not a factor, and possibly even the major determinant.⁵⁶ Oppressed agents are subjugated in more than one location. Recognising areas of similarity in these hierarchical practices as well as sharing experiences with other oppressed groups assists in recognising grander forces of domination and methods of resistance.

The notion of 'class' in contemporary British anarchism has expanded. In the past its use was restricted. 'Class' referred to agents in predominantly male, occidental environments. The anarchist category of 'class' has extended beyond the proletariat - a specific agent located at the point of production, in a particular socio-historical era. Gorz recognised that the 'proletariat' as a revolutionary subject was specific to industrialism, and that new agents were being formed as a result of technological development. Nonetheless Gorz's new revolutionary subject, the non-class, was still identified primarily in terms of a static relationship to production. Processed World, by contrast, avoided the limitations of Gorz's non-class, as it recognises that power-relations in the workplace are more fluid and contingent, but nonetheless it still concentrates on the arena of production. The Situationists and autonomists expand the analysis of class beyond the immediate sphere of production. The search for surplus labour extends managerial relationships into all aspects of social life, embroiling domestic, social and cultural activity into the arena of class struggle. Nonetheless, the autonomists and the Autonomists still maintain a universal, strategic role to the economic. Learning from Black and Women's struggles the anarchist concept of 'class' recognises that other forms of oppression have priority in some contexts. In these locations different subjugated identities have precedence, as liberation requires the oppressed themselves overthrowing their oppression.

The persistence of 'class, a term associated with economic determinism, is due to anarchism's origins in industrial struggles. Self-identifying anarchists tend to be in social terrain where economic oppression dominates. However, the four principles of anarchism, on which the ideal form of anarchism is constructed, recognise that subject identities are fluid and irreducible to a single hegemonic identity. The importance in recognising ones subjugated position, as Tong points out, assists in developing tactics in resisting oppressive power but the search for origins of oppression is not always possible. Like Ervin, Tong suggests that investigation into oppression is far less important than the attempt to overcome and supersede these hegemonic forces without recreating hierarchy [Tong, 1989, 185]. Organisation is required to create anti-hierarchical social relations that are self-affirming as well as resistant to oppressive power.

In order to be consistent with the anarchist ideal these structures must be prefigurative.

Chapter Four Organisation

A revolutionary organisation rejects any reproduction within itself of the hierarchical structures of contemporary society [Adopted by the Seventh Conference of the SI, July 1966].

[T]he revolutionary organisation has to learn that it can no longer combat alienation with alienated forms [Debord, 1983, para 122].

Introduction

The previous chapters portray contemporary anarchisms as non-linear, polymorphous movements. They are comprised of interweaving sets of temporary groupings, that lack specific origins and without a single, central universal strategic goal. Linear narrative accounts such as those enforced by the constraints of academic discourse necessitate the dissection and isolation of these strands. This is particularly problematic in discussing organisation because (as raised in the previous chapter) anarchist methods vary according to the identity of the agents in question. The types of relationships formed by oppressed subjects are an essential feature of the process of becoming a class for itself. For libertarians what matters is whether these types of organisation are in keeping with anarchist prefigurative principles.¹

There is an intimate connection between formal structures, the identity of agents, tactics and aims as indicated by (fig. 4.1.). Identities based on organisations (such as trade unions or revolutionary syndicate) and use industrial tactics such as strike action. Groups based in the community are associated with propaganda by deed, squatting and social theft. Organisational structures are conditional on context, methods and agents involved. Individuals who believe they are an elite group will create a vanguard organisation and will tend towards actions that do not require mass support. Bodies that favour legal methods, such as propaganda, may tend towards more open structures. Methods of co-ordination are associated with particular types of locality and suggest particular methods. Formal organisational structures, whether of flexible, dispersed associations, or more centralised, rigid groupings with prescribed structural blueprints have been used by different types of anarchist organisation. Thus there are examples of hierarchical local anarchist campaigns as well as those based on a more adaptable federated form. Just as some libertarian groups have adopted a Leninist analysis of the revolutionary subject so too they have adopted a similar form of organisation. As the autonomist-influenced Red Menace points out many anarchists have made the mistake of wanting a more equitable form of management instead of the more consistent libertarian ambition of abolishing all forms of hierarchy [Red Menace, 1986, 4]. However, although certain anarchist structures are inconsistent with the archetype, the most significant contemporary movements have created structures that are consistent with the prefigurative ideal.

The ideal stresses the importance of regarding organisation as pragmatic and contextual, embodying the desires of those constructing and utilising it.²

Many of the most innovative libertarian actions have come about through organisational methods consistent with the ideal. The J18, anti-World trade organisation November 30th (N30) and Mayday 2000 co-ordinating bodies involved different groups coming together where interests coincide without attempting to impose a single agenda upon all those attending.

While Mayday 1998 saw anarchist activities centred on just one location (Bradford) J18, N30 and Mayday 2000 saw events taking place in many more locations. British protests on N30 were concurrent with the larger scale ones in Seattle, USA where the World Trade Organisation were attempting to meet to further impose neo-liberal policies activities. The British activities were not just in support of the larger Seattle demonstrations but also advanced local concerns. Anarchist organisation, in its ideal form is de-centred and federal in nature. Participating anarchist groups use a variety of anti-hierarchical organisational methods, in their ideal form they are temporary and fluid. The anarchist archetype recognises that different types of organisation appeal to different types of agent, and promote and support distinctive forms of tactic.

As the forces of decomposition attempt to restrain liberatory movements, so too contrary phenomena occur such as the development of new alliances and the evolution of novel forms of confrontation. Multiple organisation is required to overcome different forms. These fluid structures encompass and construct different and changing identities. To use a commonplace example, the miners in the 1984-5 confrontation with the second Thatcher government used both their trade union organisation and also informal community structures. The latter sometimes took a covert and informal form such as the sabotage directed hit squads. It also created new active agencies through the prominent role of the miners' wives groups in the campaign. Class struggle anarchist organisations are likewise multiple, changing, reactive and proactive. The membership of appropriate anarchist movements must also be responsive to and constituted by the appropriate agent of change.³ As a result of the micro-political identification of the working class (see previous chapter), the forms of organisation have to be flexible and multiform. This was a characteristic of anarchism as far back as the 1880s⁴ and is still maintained today: 'Organisations [...] will be fluid and flexible' they 'have the ability to change or cease as circumstances dictate' [Organise! No. 42, 20].⁵

We believe that only the working class can change society from the present chaos and inequality to a society base on co-operation, mutual aid and equality. This change must be achieved by the conscious participation of the workers themselves [IWA in White, 1998, 14].

⁴ For instance the French anarchist from the 1880s quoted by Miller.

We do not believe.... in long term associations, federations, etc. In our view, a group.... should only be established at a precise point, for an immediate action; once the action is accomplished, the same group reshapes itself along new lines, whether with the same members or with new ones... [Q. in Miller, 1984, 96].

Although organisation, tactic and agent are intrinsically connected, for ease of explication this chapter deals predominantly with the organisational structures in isolation from their tactical connections as these are discussed in the next chapter. It will show that commonly held views conflating anarchism with either disapproval of association or with a particular formal structure are misplaced. While demonstrating that certain types of organisation are incompatible with an ideal tactical libertarianism, such as the vanguard party, there is no single universally appropriate method of organising.

The perception of anarchism as antipathetic to formal structures is not entirely inaccurate. Certain types of anti-organisation are consistent with a prefigurative libertarian ethic, so too are arrangements which are flexible and de-centred which have been confused with disorder. However, other anarchists who have witnessed the apparent success of Leninist and social-democratic organisational arrangements, have either wanted to imitate them or reacted against them. Various types of formal structure are adopted by anarchist groupings. The different centralised, federated, networked, democratic or dictatorial forms are examined in terms of their prefigurative content. Some are shown to be incompatible with anarchism, while the ideal types are those that are flexible, multiform coalitions created by oppressed subject groups themselves.

The final sections deal with the locality of the anarchist organisation, whether based in the workplace or in the community and the types of agent involved and excluded. This includes consideration of whether, like anarchist syndicates, organisations are open for any person (employed in a particular sector) to join regardless of their ideological consciousness, or whether like revolutionary groups, only those already committed to a particular set of principles may join.

This will demonstrate that the structures that are most adaptable, tactical and de-centred are the most appropriate to libertarians' prefigurative ethic.

1. Anti-Organisation

A common misconception, feverishly contested by contemporary libertarians, is that anarchism is identical to lack of, or even antagonism towards, organisation and a concomitant approval of chaos.⁶ Like the identification of anarchism with violence, the efforts at disassociation merely help to reinforce the general stereotype, although there are strands of anarchism that are explicitly and uniquely anti-organisation. The impassioned statements in favour of strong, but particular, forms of organisation suggest that only groupings with a reputation for the opposite would need to make such overt declarations. Consider for instance the pronouncement by Malatesta endorsed by the ACF that 'Anarchism is organisation, organisation and more organisation' [Malatesta, Q. Organise! no. 42, 20] and Class War's announcement: 'Why do we need Organisation? The short answer is that if people are to achieve any objective involving a number of others then some kind of organisation is necessary' [Class War, 1992, 126].

Part of the explanation for this perception that anarchists are anti-organisation was the pre-eminence of Leninism in radical circles, which had strict interpretations concerning appropriate industrial and revolutionary structures [Lenin, 1963, 146].⁷ Because of the tightly defined formal structures normally associated with the term, 'organisation', there is a tendency for many critics to believe that libertarians have rejected organisation even when they have formal, if somewhat more flexible guidelines. Anarchists reject the rigid hierarchies and centralism of Leninist revolutionary organisational practice⁸ as such methods are incompatible with their prefigurative principles of the abolition of hierarchies and the promotion of autonomous, creative power.⁹

Multiple and flexible organisation, concordant with the anarchist ideal, is not the same as the rejection of association. Nor is the rejection of organisation the same as inadequate or inappropriate structures. Promotion of diverse organisation is not the sole cause of the (mis-)association of anarchism with anti-organisation. There are currents within the libertarian tradition that are suspicious of not only the familiar organisational arrangements based on hierarchy and coercion, but any formal structures. Activists and theorists regard the lack of a clear organisational arrangement as one of anarchisms' main frailties. Liberal critics too have associated anarchism with anti-organisation. The historian F. G. Clarke comments that the 1905 Russian Revolution failed to take a decisively anarchist direction not because there was inadequate support for libertarianism but because its mode of operation made it difficult for them to act effectively. 'There were many sympathizers with the libertarian philosophy espoused by the anarchists, but by its very nature it lack of organisational structure [Red Action No. 56, 4-5].

was a belief that made tight organisation and activity almost impossible' [Clarke, 1983, 18]. Joll too proposes that anarchists fail to take a decisive role in revolutionary situations because: '[T]heir principles made organisation so difficult' [Joll, 1979, 176].¹⁰ Joll and Clarke are mistaken because it is often inappropriate co-operative structures in given contexts, not a rejection of organisation, that is responsible for anarchism's historical failures.

There are three types of anti-organisation. The first rejects all organisation on a supposedly prefigurative basis. The second rejects all forms of organisation prior to the revolutionary period, but supports spontaneous revolutionary structures, such as the Soviets of 1905 or the Hungarian workers' councils of 1956. This type is found most clearly in the council communist tendencies (referred to as councilists). The final form of anti-organisation only rejects any formal structure which is imposed on the revolutionary agent. This latter type of anti-organisation is the most compatible with the micropolitical anti-representational characteristics of contemporary British libertarianism. As the revolutionary agent is context dependent, it has different organisational requirements that promote multiple, flexible structures.

1.1. The First Form of Spontaneity: Chaosism

Anti-organisational tendencies associated with anarchism are not solely the result of malicious misrepresentation, as there are sections of anarchism that appear to celebrate the rejection of any form of organisation. The anonymous writer of the early 1980s tract Oh No Not Again proposes examining relationships in order to cut down dependency whether mutual or otherwise [Oh No Not Again, 6]. One of the reasons for this popular connection with disorder may be due, according to Daniel Guerin, to the fact that anarchism is defined as 'absence of authority or government' [Guerin, 1970, 11]. The correlation of anarchism with chaos, while generally held, is considered by Guerin and class struggle anarchists as inappropriate. The rejection extends only to hierarchical and heteronomous control. This may lead to a 'complete disorganisation' of present society but it will also lead to 'a new, stable and rational order based on freedom and solidarity' [Guerin, 1970, 12].¹¹

A further reason for the link between anarchism and disorganisation maybe evinced in the correlation of the term 'anti-organisation' with 'chaos'. Some anarchists also seem confused by the association, on the one hand celebrating chaotic, spontaneous moments,¹² while also recognising that organisation is necessary for action.¹³ On the one side are contemporary anarchists like Booth and tendencies in the Subversion who follow Nechaev and envision a wholly ordered society albeit of differing types.¹⁴ On the other side there are those influenced by situationist thinking such as Hakim Bey who dreams of

¹³ The ACF argue that organisation is necessary for the achievement of aims, but that these can be 'free associations, collectives, federations, communes or "families" [which] will be fluid and flexible' [Organise! No. 42, 28].

¹⁴ See for instance Subversion's support for central planning in Subversion No. 14, 10 a wholly unstructured future society, in which there is still the possibility for the unpredictable, the unfamiliar, and even the sinister.

Anarchism celebrates the chaotic features of the carnivalesque, with its associations of participation, unpredictability, excitement, rejection of norms and mockery of heteronomous authority [Bazzoni, 414]. These include the band of drummers and the masked and costumed participants on the March Against the Monarchy [31.10.98], the festival sound systems used in the anti-Criminal Justice Bill antics in 1994 or Reclaim the Streets road parties (1996-9). Such revelry subverts the traditional motifs of political action, allowing greater individual participation less constrained by the normal conventions of protest.¹⁵ Carnival has authoritarian features which cannot be overlooked: its provision as a safety-valve to contain revolt, the subverted norms which can become either a reinforcement of the existing laws by their obvious parody, or in turn become established ceremonies secured into the existing symbolic order. However, these chaotic celebrations nevertheless hold out the promise of unrestrained individual free-play. It is this possibility of breaking out of prescribed roles and the opportunity to create new associations, rather than the abandonment of all alliances, that makes carnival attractive to anarchists both as means and end.

'Spontaneity', associated with the carnivalesque, has many differing and competing interpretations. For some class-struggle anarchists its meaning lies closer to 'autonomous' organisation, while for Leninists it is seen as anti-organisation, such that rational structures are replaced by instinctive relationships. This latter interpretation has connotations of conditioned responses promoted by capitalism and as such are prone to the turmoil of the market place, whilst for Lenin freedom was the result of appropriate planning [Lenin, 1963, 70].¹⁶

The order/chaos, organisation/anti-organisation distinctions do not overlap. A strong authoritarian organisation, such as the German National Socialist government of 1933-45, is often hugely chaotic. Anti-organisation may itself lead to the creation of hierarchy and authoritarian social order, as political thinkers both ancient and modern have made clear.¹⁷ It has also been a strategy of authoritarian movements to produce situations of great disorder so as to create popular desire for a strong central authority.¹⁸ This situation of anti-social turmoil is identified with 'anarchy',¹⁹ although it has little to do with the egalitarianism of class-struggle libertarianism.

Although Booth in Green Anarchist praised the fascistic bombers at Oklahoma and the theocratic cult which used sarin gas to murder commuters on the Tokyo underground, because these assaults disrupts the smooth functioning of an oppressive society (termed 'the machine') [Booth, 1998, 11-2].

Social chaos such as the civil war in Somalia, is not a society of equals indulging in free-interplay, but one in which hierarchically organised gangs acquire dominance by force alone [Subversion, No. 12e, 7].²⁰ Phenomena viewed as social chaos are not often equivalent to anarchism. Consistent class-struggle anarchists argue that the strongest form of organisational rejection does not avoid hierarchy but creates a situation which allows those already existing in the wider oppressive social setting to continue to dominate. The object of organisation as Malatesta explained was to enable co-operation by the oppressed groups without which people were 'subject to the general organisation of society' [Malatesta, 1984, 85].

Just as authoritarian groups devise conspiracies of confusion to allow the most heavily armed and disciplined forces to dominate, so too situations of informality may unintentionally allow the strongest to gain command. Jo Freeman an, anarcha-feminist, describes how the leaderless, structureless groups common to the radical women's groups of the late 1960s came to be controlled by the most powerful and charismatic as there are no formal structures to prevent their domination [Freeman, 1984, 6-8 & 12]. With no adequate system permitting the less confident to participate a situation develops which members of Class War in the 1980s used to refer to as the

'dictatorship of the big-mouths'. However, leaderless groups, criticised by Freeman and supported by Cathy Levine, need not degenerate into informal hierarchies. Safeguards such as chairing rotas, randomised agenda and techniques for egalitarian participation can be temporarily installed without creating permanent formal structures [Levine, 1984].²¹ Temporary multiform organisation while capable of being hierarchical can also resist such formations. Anti-organisation is not a rejection of structure, but the replacement of formal ones with informal ones. Whilst informal structures may replicate the worst excesses of some constituted bodies as described by Freedman, nonetheless neither types of organisation must necessarily take this form [Freeman, 1984, 6-7].

The creation of new types of social relations requires co-ordination but these may remain egalitarian if the group dynamics encourage flexibility and non-elitism and hence do not contradict the prefigurative principles of libertarianism. Similarly, modern chaos theory demonstrates even in unconstrained systems a spontaneous order can be created, a phenomena Hayek terms Kosmos. The concept of spontaneous harmony negates the supposed opposition between order and chaos and is captured in the symbol of anarchism - the circled 'A' [Marshall, 1992, 558] (fig. 4.2.). Contemporary anarchists are aware of the anti-social connotations of 'chaos'. As a result many anarchists revile the term, wishing to associate it with economic oppressive conditions which bring about unplanned (although foreseeable) famines and destructive behaviour. 'Neither is anarchism chaos. The present system is chaos. An anarchist society would be infinitely more ordered and sane: Chernobyls and vast food mountains in Europe alongside starving millions in Ethiopia would not be allowed to exist' [ACF, 1990e, 14]. The ACF, aware of Leninist and liberal critics which regard anarchism as disorganised and anti-social, overreact and overlook libertarian interpretations of chaos which are compatible with spontaneous equitable, flexible social structures.²²

One of the few class-struggle publications to acknowledge the possibilities inherent in chaos was Proletarian Gob.²³ The subtitle of its first issue proclaimed: 'Only when the working class is completely out of control will we be able to take control of our lives' [Proletarian Gob No. 1, 1]. Gob seems to suggest that only in circumstances of unplanned disorder that freedom can be developed, a view which borrows specifically from Bakunin who similarly maintained that it was through breaking the restraining ties of existing organisational forms, products of oppressive societies, that the masses will be liberated. Gob's delight in disorder is more rhetorical than programmatic, as he too tends towards the second and third forms, yet he does indicate that there are certain incidents which can be described as chaotic which are also liberatory.

1.2. Second Form: Organisation Only in Revolutionary Epochs

The second form of anti-organisation rejects all forms of organisation prior to the revolutionary period. This form of spontaneity has a strong influence on contemporary British anarchism, although it is rarely rigorously adhered to. This trend comes predominantly, but not exclusively, from within the council communist (councilist) tradition. This revolutionary movement, one of the targets of Lenin's tract "Left-Wing Communism: An Infantile Disorder", was influenced by incidents such as the Russian soviets of 1905 and was strengthened by the examples of the German workers' and soldiers' councils of 1918-9. Proletarians in times of immense social conflict succeeded in building their own institutions external to the trade unions and socialist parties.

The councilist tradition includes figures such as Anton Pannekoek, Herman Gorter and more contemporarily Francois Martin²⁴ and Jean Barrot (who sometimes writes under the name Gilles Dauvé). The councilists at the start of the twentieth century supported working class and labour groupings such as trade unions as these bodies prepare the revolutionary class and help the proletariat to advance revolutionary demands [Pannekoek, 1978a, 59-60]. Gorter and Pannekoek even accepted the legitimacy of Leninist revolutionary parties in contexts such as those that applied in Eastern Europe in the first two decades but felt they were inappropriate to the West [Gorter, 1989, 7-10 & Pannekoek, 1978c, 144].

The early councilists, such as Pannekoek, started as members of social democratic parties [Smart, 1978, 10-11]. Yet, they witnessed how these organisations replicate the hierarchical features of capitalism through a process of integration into the functioning of that society. Trade unions and even revolutionary parties, once the possibility of revolution has passed, become reified. These structures are co-opted into the system they sought to overthrow. Rather than encouraging autonomous activity by the working class trade unions, reformist and revolutionary parties impede the autonomy of the revolutionary class [Pannekoek, 1978b, 111].²⁵ Unions exist predominantly to assist in selling labour for commercial exploitation and thereby maintain that system of production and exchange [Martin, 1997, 57-9].²⁶

The free one-off British journal Anti-Exchange & Mart²⁷ which accepted the councilist critique of trade unions, describes how other forms of workplace organisation soon face the pressure of being co-opted into assisting management [see section 4].²⁸ The only alternative is to create a group which allows entry only to revolutionaries who share a tightly defined ideological position and to participate in other broader organisations in times of overt industrial conflict [Anti-Exchange & Mart, 1990e, 11-12]. Dauvé explains that as 'revolutionaries do not organise themselves outside the organs "spontaneously" created by the workers' [Dauvé & Martin, 1997, 64] all they can do is organise contacts with other revolutionaries but without carrying through any program.

²⁵ See too Shipway, 1987, 110-11

²⁸ Subversion argues that trade unions were always counterrevolutionary. 'Trade unions do not exist to change society. They were set up to fight over the division of the capitalist cake, not to take over the bakery. Indeed, without the buying and selling economy, based on wage labour, there is no role for a trade union' [Subversion, 1993e, 13].

The belief that revolutionary moments are characterised by the revolutionary class creating new modes of autonomous organisation separate from existing integrated structures is one of the central features of council communism which is developed by the autonomist tradition. Capitalism tries to incorporate the working class and its organisations into its system of production and exchange in order to extract surplus value (profit) [Cleaver, 1979, 53]. In order to retain any independence and develop its autonomy, the oppressed subject has to break with these absorbed organisations and recompose itself through new organisational forms [Cleaver, 1979, 56]. It is this feature of abstention from participation in organisations such as unions or revolutionary syndicates that is the main cause of disagreement between councilists and other libertarians. Furthermore, councilists stand accused of elitism for their advocacy of separate groups for revolutionaries.

Pannekoek and Gorter are clearly libertarian in proclaiming that the subjugated must overthrow their oppressors themselves rather than wait to have it done on their behalf.

A small party or leadership clique cannot rule over the mighty proletariat: neither during nor after the revolution.

Who must rule here, during and after the revolution? Who must exercise dictatorship?

The class itself, the proletariat. At least the great majority of it [Gorter, 1978, 151].

Gorter and Pannekoek, while proclaiming the autonomy of the proletariat, maintain a distinction between those who recognise the need for revolution in the period prior to the revolutionary situation ('revolutionaries) and those who overthrow the conditions of capitalism ('the masses' or 'proletariat').²⁹ The Leninist strategic implications of this are manifold. First, they posit one universal revolutionary class regardless of context, determined by a single source of power. Second, they presuppose that the appropriate responses and states of consciousness required by the oppressed to liberate themselves can be known independently of that class. This latter, ironically, was recognised by the councilists as characteristic of the counterrevolutionary authoritarianism of Leninism.³⁰

As explained in the previous chapter, the anarchist ideal recognises that oppressive power occurs variably and is not confined to locations such as the workplace. Different practices create different changeable oppressive power relations. There is no single fixed set of individuals who can be universally identified as the subject able to resist such forms of domination. There is no objective position from which a revolutionary section can be identified. Nor is it possible to make clear-cut distinctions between revolutionary and non-revolutionary periods. Pannekoek himself realised, when criticising Kautsky, that there is no distinction between 'day-to-day action and revolution' [Pannekoek, 1978a, 66]. For those not involved, an incident between one oppressed group and its oppressors may appear to be unimportant, but to

³⁰ See for instance:

A revolution can no more be made by a big mass party or a coalition of different parties than by a small radical party. It breaks out spontaneously among the masses; action instigated by a party can sometimes trigger it off (a rare occurrence), but the determining forces lie elsewhere, in the psychological factors deep in the unconscious of the masses and in the great events of world politics [Pannekoek, 1978b, 100].

those involved it may mark a fundamental shift of power.

The council communist view of spontaneity nevertheless is an important contribution to contemporary post-structural anarchism. Its belief that subjugated agents can rise against oppression in a libertarian fashion without a revolutionary organisation to guide them is certainly accepted by more formal anarchist organisations, for instance in Class War and the ACF's support for rioters,³¹ but they maintain that not all anarchist tactics can rely on spontaneity of this sort. Universalising independent organisation restricts certain forms of libertarian action. The solution, consistent with the prefigurative ideal, is multiple forms of organisation constructed by the oppressed group themselves which evinces unmediated social relations.

1.3. Third Form: Organisation by Oppressed Subject Groups

The third form of spontaneity, which is most consistent with the anarchist ideal, is the dominant type of anti-organisation in contemporary British libertarianism. Unlike the councilist approach this method of co-ordination recognises that organisation is not specific to revolutionary epochs (however defined) or for a predetermined elite of revolutionaries. However, like the councilists it rejects any formal structure which is imposed on the revolutionary agent. 'What we mean by working class spontaneity is the ability of that class to take direct action on its own behalf and to develop new forms of struggle and organisation' [ACF, 1991e, 2]. Anarchist means of co-operation are in contrast to the orthodox communist methods as they embody the egalitarian social forms that they seek.

³¹ See the video Poll Tax Riot by ACAB, especially the footage of the BBC interview with Andy Murphy.

In Like A Summer With A Thousand July's (sic.), a libertarian analysis of the 1981 urban riots, the authors report approvingly the response of a heckler to the interventions by Claire Doyle, a member of Militant.

Doyle [...] was constantly heckled by the youth of Brixton and Toxteth when she tried to hustle in on their action by calling for the setting up of a Labour Committee (euphemism for the Labour Party) for both neighbourhoods. She was rightly accused of trying to make political capital out of the riots. When she told a Brixton meeting, 'You have to organise to defend yourselves', the reply came back, 'We will defend ourselves' [Smith, Tucker, et. al., 1982, 21].

Any external political organisation, whether calling itself marxist, Leninist or anarchist is condemned by the authors as an external imposition on the oppressed. Any form of political organisation not directly of and by the particular groups subjugated is regarded as an attempt to re-introduce hierarchies, in this case with political leadership at the top and the locals of Toxteth and Brixton as clients at the bottom.

Subversion explain their organisational ideal in similar anti-Leninist terms: 'If some bunch of fascist thugs is harassing black workers then they deserve a good beating and we should support those workers organising themselves to sort the fascists out, in whatever way we can' [Subversion No. 10, 8]. The anarchist ideal is that no organisation, including libertarian groups, can represent the multifaceted nature of resistance to oppressive power. Consequently, anarchist groups are not leading the oppressed but acting for their own emancipation from economic oppression. 'We exist not as something separate from the working class, not as some leadership for others to follow, but as part of the working class working for our own liberation' [Subversion, 1993, 24]. The basis for action has to be the autonomous organisation of those affected, with solidarity arranged on the basis of self-identified and reciprocal shared interests.

The emphasis on self-organisation undirected by external groupings can be found in the earliest British anarchist periodicals. The newspaper Freedom reported autonomous strike action and Welsh anti-tithe (church tax) agitations [Freedom Vol. 1. No. 1, October 1886, 4]. Contemporary anarchist sheets continue to give prominence to radical actions organised by the working class, regardless of whether an anarchist group was formally involved. This is in contrast to many Leninist groups. They give prominence primarily to the campaigns in which their particular organisation is active.³² Anarchist groups, ideally, are made up of those in oppressed subject positions and, unlike the councilists, they do not make a significant distinction between revolutionaries and the mass. 'Class War is not just another party seeking to gain power or a new way of telling people what to do' [Class War, 1991, 7]. Although this is consistent with the anarchist ideal, in practice many libertarian groups have tended to replicate the features of Leninist organisation that was hegemonic in revolutionary circles for over 70 years.

2. Formal Structures: Leninist Organisation

The primary political structure which anarchist groups define themselves against is the Leninist political party, although as will be shown certain features of Leninism reappear in libertarian organisation. Considerable amounts of anarchist propaganda have been directed against these repressive structures, especially prior to the fall of the Berlin Wall when orthodox communist groupings were more popular and influential.³³The critique of the party has three main features. The first is that the Party has strategic weaknesses, identifying just one central location of power which is known not primarily by those subject to it, but to a privileged elite. The second critique follows from the first, concerns a paternalistic attitude towards the revolutionary subject, and the promotion of an elite to guide the already subjugated group. Finally, the party's magisterial structures restrain autonomous activity and create hierarchical and oppressive relationships.

2.1. Strategic Weaknesses

Although Lenin recognises that the revolutionary struggle will take place not just at the point of production, he did maintain that there is one identifiable source of oppressive power, the economy [Lenin, 1963, 86]. The economic battle determines all other forms of conflict including the political struggle for governance of the state. The proletariat establishes control through the abolition of the economic power of capital ensures that the state becomes a non-repressive power and withers away [Lenin, 1976, 28-30]. This primary source of oppressive power is knowable independent of the experiences of those who are subject to it. The oppressed rather than being the primary movers in resisting their oppression are secondary, they require first and foremost a revolutionary elite to guide them. Without the vanguard, the working class can only assist 'bourgeois democracy' [Lenin, 1963, 118]. By contrast, the anarchist archetype has a more tactical approach to power. There is no dominant central power, so there is no vanguard who can articulate a true nature of oppression [May, 1994, 117]. Consequently there is no single group who can represent the oppressed group, but the subjugated group itself, hence anarchisms' prefigurative rejections of representative bodies.

Lenin however considered the class struggle to be understood as an objective social science. Intellectuals properly versed in appropriate study would be fully able to appreciate the correct strategies for combating autocratic and bourgeois democratic rule. Socialism, argues Lenin:

[H]as grown out of the philosophical, historical, and economic theories that were worked out by the educated representatives of the propertied classes - the intelligentsia. The founders of modern scientific socialism, Marx and Engels, themselves belonged by social status to the bourgeois intelligentsia [Lenin, 1963, 63].

The dependence on the dominant elite for leadership is not a matter of regret for Lenin, for the working class was incapable of developing adequate political consciousness, as they do not have the time for sufficient study [Lenin, 1963, 164].³⁴ The working class requires leaders properly versed in marxism to educate the masses and raise their consciousness [Lenin, 1963, 175-6]. Anarchists on the contrary are critical of the view that intellectuals and the middle classes are more able to represent the interests and desires of the oppressed group than the oppressed themselves. 'To the Left the working class are there to be ordered about because we are too thick to think for ourselves' [Class War, 1991, 15-6]. This is not to say that the anarchist ideal demands that the expressions of every section of the working class in itself presents the most suitable form of action. Libertarians are aware of the hierarchical tendencies within apparently oppositional methods,³⁵ but they recognise that no other group is capable of programming the actions of others. The rejection of vanguards does not mean that those anarchists and others who are members of an oppressed group must follow the majority view, they can chose to act prefiguratively for themselves and in doing so provide opportunities for others to act likewise.

³⁴ Lenin argues that those workers who show sufficient promise as key revolutionaries should be financially supported by the revolutionary organisation so that their efforts are not wasted in earning a living. 'An agitator from among the workers who is at all talented and "promising" must not work in the factory eleven hours a day' but must be kept fresh for the party [Lenin, 1963, 153].

2.2. Paternalism

Lenin and his anarchist critics agree that the economically oppressed do not create political parties autonomously as their main weapon. As Lamb points out, the revolutionary party was never a method of organisation that erupted spontaneously from the Western working class. In fact, in revolutionary situations they spontaneously developed other organisational forms, such as Pannekoek and Gorter's favoured workers' councils [Lamb, 1997, 11]. For Lenin this was merely evidence of the backwardness of the oppressed group and of the necessity for trained revolutionaries to provide the leadership.³⁶ A revolutionary elite or cadre is required who have the appropriate training and social background. Only these people are in a position to direct appropriate action.

³⁵ For example participating in the general election to vote a despised politician out of office [Direct Action, No. 6, Spring 1998, 4-5].

Leninist paternalism met bitter criticism from liberation socialists. Castoriadis indicates that the official working class organisations built on Leninist lines act as a restraint on working class involvement.

The [official] working class organisations have become indistinguishable from bourgeois political institutions. They bemoan the lack of working class participation but each time the workers attempt massively to participate, they shout that the struggle is 'unofficial' or against the 'best interests' of the union or the party.

The bureaucratic organisations prevent the active intervention of workers. They prostitute the very idea of socialism which they see as a mere external modification of existing society, not requiring the active participation of the masses. [Castoriadis, 1969, <39>, 15]

As Ken Weller a member of the Castoriadis-influenced Solidarity group explained, such paternalism reduces the working class to 'actual or potential clients' while the party is an 'elite' [Weller in Flux, No. 5, 8]. The party replicates the order-giving managerial role of capitalism which revolutionary socialism is supposed to supersede.

2.3. Authoritarian Structures

Lenin's What Is To Be Done provides the blueprint for traditional Communist organisation. It was written before working-class parties were finally legalised in Russia in 1905, although Lenin still maintained much of the organisational detail after this date. Ernst Fischer defends Lenin by arguing that tightly controlled party discipline was necessary after this date because of the possibility that legal sanctions would be reintroduced [Lenin, 1972, 39-40]. Lenin certainly acceded to some democratic changes after 1905 which did not risk the survival of the Bolshevik Social Democrats (precursor to the Communist Party), yet even after Lenin's faction had seized power and their legality was secured, the requirements for party discipline remained in place. In "Left-Wing Communism, An Infantile Disorder" written in 1920 Lenin maintains that the membership of the party must be subservient to the will of the leadership in order to reach the objectively knowable ends [Lenin, 1975, 5-8].

To avoid infiltration and wasteful theoretical disagreements the revolutionary party was to be directed by a small group of dependable and hardened revolutionaries who would influence the organisations of the working class along the appropriate predetermined communist lines [Lenin, 1963, 144-5]. The minority elite were to 'centralize all the secret aspects of the work - preparation of leaflets, the drawing up of rough plans, the appointing of leaders from each district [...]' [Lenin, 1963, 146] without the intervention of the subjugated class. The pivotal position of the party in the process of emancipation resulted in underplaying of autonomous actions. By definition, for Leninists, if the subjugated acted without the guiding hand of the revolutionary elite their action must be bourgeois [Weller in Flux, No. 5, 10]. Hence the constant stress on the importance of maintaining the party, not just in Lenin's writings but also by his followers.³⁷ As Lamb maintains the result of giving precedence to preserving the party is that, in true Hegelian fashion, the interests of the instrument becomes dominant over those of the subject class. The syllogism of the working class using the party to achieve its aim of liberation, results in the means becoming the end, just as in the master-slave dialectic, the serfs who mediate between the lords and the satisfaction of their desires, gain mastery over them (as discussed in Chapter Two).

Leninism is driven by hypothetical imperatives, where predetermined ends impose particular forms of action. Lenin outlines the form of revolutionary structure which will ensure firstly its own organisational survival and then further the 'political struggle' [Lenin, 1963, 126]. Lenin's programme for revolution requires the most efficient form of organisation in order to reach these ends. Leninists consequently propose a centralist form of organisation which can act effectively, without wasting time on democratic accountability, which rarely operates efficiently [Lenin, 1963, 160-1].

[T]he revolutionary socialist party must also be centralised. For it is an active party, not a debating society. It needs to be able to intervene collectively in the class struggle, and to respond quickly, so it must have a leadership capable of taking day-to-day decisions in the name of the party [Harman, 1979, 50].

The SWP of which Harman is a leading propagandist deliberately follows Lenin. The leadership of the party has to be a professional corps, able to efficiently direct the subject class to its desired end. The division of labour within revolutionary groupings is essential for its effectiveness [Lenin, 1963, 167].³⁸ Against this method of separation and specialism anarchists (as mentioned in Section 1.1.) attempt to create structures which limit dependence on leaders greater and encourage participation, by promoting the transfer of skills, rather than the maintenance of distinctions.

Leninist centralism and elitism, with its correspondingly paternalistic view of the membership and the subject class, often results in brutal treatment of those at the lower end of the hierarchy. Accounts are legion. Solidarity in the 1970s and 80s, and Trotwatch more recently have provided detailed accounts of the behaviour of party officials towards their lower-ranking members. These have included an almost cultist brainwashing of members, threats of violence against party-dissenters and complete absence of democratic control of the leadership by the membership.³⁹

2.4. The Invisible Dictatorship

While anarchists have been vocal in criticising the major revolutionary socialist tradition for constructing repressive structures, it is another irony that the main originator of this critique, Bakunin, appears to propose a structure even more repressive than the specialist party [Morland, 1997, 85-6]. Like most of Bakunin's theorising his ideas on the invisible dictatorship are not only ill formed, but also frequently contradictory [Thomas, 1980, 283-4]. Many contemporary libertarians who are sympathetic to Bakunin drawing on him as a thinker and as a rebellious icon have tended to ignore his more dictatorial leanings. The ACF for instance in their booklet on Bakunin⁴⁰ make no mention of his collaboration with Nechaev (see below), and regard his conspiratorial organisational strategies culminating in the invisible dictatorship as just aiming to influence the revolution not to direct it [ACF, 1991e, 16].

Left-wing opponents certainly tend to be less forgiving. Red Action, for instance, portray Bakunin as being 'the enemy of all official dictatorships - he wanted an unofficial one' [Red Action No. 56, 4], an interpretation for which there is plenty of evidence. For instance in a letter to Nechaev, in which Bakunin extricates himself from his young, former comrades' plans, he lays out his own preferred revolutionary organisational scheme:

[T]otal destruction of the framework of state and law and of the whole of the so-called bourgeois civilization by a spontaneous people's revolution invisibly led, not by an official dictatorship, but by a nameless and collective one, composed of those in favour of a total people's liberation from all oppression, firmly acting in support of a common aim and in accordance with a common programme [Bakunin, 1993e, 6]

There are two main inter-related features which makes Bakunin's organisational project inconsistent with the libertarian ideal. Firstly, like Lenin, he believes that the oppressed require a vanguard who can best understand their oppression and lead their emancipation, which contradicts with libertarianism advocacy of liberation (self-emancipation) over mediation. Second, Bakunin holds that the link between the masses and leadership is to be kept secret.

Bakunin had a passion for the clandestine, a not unique characteristic in revolutionary circles in the early Nineteenth Century.⁴¹ It is this conspiratorial feature alone that is often considered incompatible with prefigurative principles. Yet, secrecy itself is not necessarily incompatible with anarchism, as is seen below. Certain revolutionary organisational tactics supported by contemporary libertarians such as the miners' hit squads were hardly models of free, open organisation. What makes Bakunin's invisible dictatorship unacceptable is that the oppressed agents are excluded from the conspiracy. Secretive organisation aimed at excluding government and other interventions are common within anarchist circles. Security precautions in contacting libertarian groups are often recommended because of the interest (real and imagined) state security services take in activists.⁴² Similarly, the Anderson's SPLAT Collective aims to exclude the order-giving middle classes while trying to be inclusive of the working class, so as to increase the latter's autonomous power [SPLAT Collective, 1998, 13].⁴³ The aim, however, unlike Bakunin's invisible dictatorship is to be open and accessible to the oppressed subject groups. There is a problem when secrecy intended to exclude only oppressive agents starts to proscribe the group who wish to overcome their subjugation as well, a point discussed in further detail below.

Just as theorising was dismissed by Bone as discourse directed at a privileged group at the expense of the wider potential revolutionary subject, so too Bakunin's invisible dictatorship, as Debord points out, restricts the design of liberation to a universal vanguard [Debord, 1983, para. 91]. It is not secrecy per se, but the type of groups that are excluded, which makes Bakunin's conspiratorial plans incompatible with its commitment to prefigurative direct action.

⁴³ The problems associated with such a strategy are unintentionally recognised by Andy Anderson because universal criteria for inclusion/exclusion are impossible to draw [Anderson & Anderson, 1998, 20-1].

3. Contemporary Anarchist Structures

There are many different structures used by anarchist organisations, from the formal centralised grouping with a clear strategy and political programme, to the diffuse temporary network. They appear in a variety of contexts from the industrial setting, to direct confrontations with the state and quasi-state bodies, in environmental protests and in autonomous community developments. A libertarian grouping may take one form in one context, for instance an non-aligned, informal anti-poll tax union might become a more permanent, stable but more limited legal defence campaign. In this section organisational structures are examined in terms of the diffusion of power within these bodies, across them and between the libertarian grouping and the oppressed subject. The next two (sections 4 and 5) examine these structures in the context of specific contemporary groupings in the workplace and in the community.

Anarchist movements have often been differentiated from Leninist ones on the basis of their organisational differences. The more localised, informal structures favoured by libertarians are often a consequence of previous flirtations by members with Leninist and other centralist groupings. After alienating experiences within traditional political bodies, activists who go over to anarchism try to avoid recreating repressive, hierarchical structures [Weller in Flux No. 5, 9-10].⁴⁴ Nonetheless, there are features of Leninist organisation which have been overtly and covertly incorporated into anarchist structures. The most obvious attempt at Leninising anarchism was the Organisational Platform of the Libertarian Communists [henceforth The Platform]. Supporters of The Platform (Platformists) are not the only ones from the anarchist tradition who superimpose an identity onto subjugated groups. Many anarchist critics of The Platform also share strategic weaknesses with Leninism which are incompatible with the libertarian paradigm.

3.1. Centralism and the Platform

The Platform was written by a group of exiled Russians including Nestor Makhno (the commander of the Ukrainian insurrectionary force that fought both the White and Red Armies during the Russian Civil War), Ida Mett, Piotr Archinov, Valevsky and Linsky. Together they printed an organisational blueprint in 1926 under the name of The Dielo Trouda Group. This document responded to the failure of the libertarians to prevent the Bolshevik reaction after the success of the October Revolution. In Britain various groups have embraced the main tenets of The Platform, amongst them the AWA (Anarchist Workers Association) and the short-lived AWG (Anarchist Workers Group) (see Appendix One]. In the 26 Counties of Ireland, the WSM (Workers Solidarity Movement) has taken up the organisational plan outlined in this document. The main features of The Platform are shared with Leninism, namely criticisms of past shortcomings of libertarian modes of organisation and a proposed centralised structure as the solution. The Platform identifies the cause of anarchist failure to be the fault 'disorganisation' and 'chaotic' organisation [The Platform, 1989, 11]. The Platform's other shared characteristics with Leninism are a paternalistic attitude towards subjugated groups, which designates a universal vanguard; and the repressive character of this representative body, the centralised Anarchist Union, which is to lead the social revolution.

As with Lenin, there is just one source of repression, the class struggle, which is a product of capitalism. 'The social enslavement and exploitation of the working masses form the base on which modern society stands, without which this society could not exist' and this 'generated a class struggle' which has

'general, universal scope [....] in the life of class societies' [The Platform, 1989, 14]. Oppression can be determined objectively as emanating from one source. Unlike Leninism, Platformists did believe that the working classes can, and do, develop sufficient awareness of their social position without the necessity of the intervention of bourgeois intellectuals [The Platform, 1989, 19].⁴⁵ However the Platformists still gives priority to the leadership of a vanguard. The Platform recognises that some workers prior to periods of social upheaval developed revolutionary ideas before other sections of the subjugated class. This advanced group are the self-identified Anarchists who are to join the General Union of Anarchists [The Platform, 1989, 20]. These individuals, as Joe White (a member of the AWG) explains, are the 'vanguard' [White, 1990, 26-7].

The AWG who used The Platform as its organisational basis make a distinction between their interpretation of the 'vanguard' and that of Leninism [White, 1990, 24]. The AWG argue that Lenin's advanced group had organisational priority over the subjugated class, while they maintain only a 'leadership of ideas'. Lenin saw the party as 'the most advanced expression of proletarian rule' which leads to the 'substitution of party rule for class power' [White, 1990, 26]. In contrast, argues White, his group proclaimed no

⁴⁵ See too the comment:

The class struggle created by the enslavement of workers and their aspirations of liberty gave birth, in the oppression, to the idea of anarchism [....]

So anarchism does not derive from the abstract reflections of an intellectual or a philosopher, but from the direct struggle of workers against capitalism, from the needs and necessities of the workers, from their aspirations to liberty and equality, aspirations which become particularly alive in the best heroic period of life and struggle of the working masses [The Platform, 1989, 15].

organisational or individual priority, but that anarchist principles should be regarded as the most advanced [White, 1990, 27]. White's distinction is an insufficient ground for claiming an adequate differentiation from Leninism. Followers of The Platform still maintain that there is a strategic objective anarchist science, according to which libertarian tactics can be prescribed irrespective of context or popular movements. This view contradicts the libertarian principle of self-emancipation, in that the vanguard claim to know the best means to achieve goals. Second, organisational superiority of the vanguard, in the manner of Lenin's party, also recreates hierarchy between the 'conscious' minority and subjugated classes. Thirdly, as in the revolutionary party, there is a hierarchy within the vanguard group.⁴⁶

The libertarian architect does not deny that certain groups are most in conflict within the prevailing sets of powers and in this sense take a lead. The Platform conflicts with the ideal because it jumps from the particular to the universal that, in which those who are the most militant in one section are regarded as representing the most suitable anarchist tactics over all. The type of organisational structure aspired to by the AWG was based on cadres, a group of highly-knowledgeable militants who would be the core of a central body which promulgates anarchist ideas to the general revolutionary class [White, 1990, 28]. The General Union co-ordinates the scattered local federations and groups and moves the concentrated anarchist movement towards a strategic 'clearly recognised goal' [The Platform, 1989, 12].

Although the masses express themselves profoundly

in social movement in terms of anarchist tendencies and tenets, these tendencies and tenets do however remain dispersed, being uncoordinated, and consequently do not lead to the organisation of the driving power of libertarian ideas which is necessary for preserving the anarchist orientation and objectives of the social revolution [The Platform, 1989, 21].

There is a set of predetermined ideas to be applied by the vanguard faction into other various working class organisations such as the trade unions. The General Union not only claims the ability to speak better for others than the subjugated group itself, but also attempts to use the subjugated class for its predetermined aims, reducing the autonomous subject as objects. As a Liverpool-based anarcho-syndicalist pointed out, the aim of intervening in all workers struggles to guide them in accordance with predetermined objectives is 'edging very close to the idea of a party leadership: an anarchist vanguard controlling a wider labour movement' [Paul, Liverpool DAM, 1991, 14].⁴⁷

The repressive feature of the General Union is the imposition of 'Theoretical Unity', 'Tactical Unity' and 'Collective Responsibility' [The Platform, 1989, 32]. The first two principles are based on the supposed universal nature of anarchist economic and social analysis that makes it possible to determine other's methods. Such a strategic approach leads to the creation of a cadre organisation directing operations and tying its membership to centrally determined decisions, in a manner similar to that described earlier by Harman of the SWP.

The actual implementation of tactical unity is more problematic. General tactical positions must of course be decided by the whole membership through national conferences. However, general positions can not anticipate all the questions that the class struggle throws up....

Thus the executive committee would not simply serve an administrative role but would be delegated with responsibility of deciding tactics in between conferences [White, 1990, 27].

White makes more explicit than The Platform itself the centralising feature of the General Union, i.e. the pivotal role of the Executive Committee. The structure of the Executive Committee has other parallels with the Leninist party. The leadership is regarded as being in advance of the followers and this leads to hierarchical relationships within the group. For The Platform, stresses the 'theoretical and organisational orientation' determined by the Executive Committee of the General Union over the whole organisation. Executive and democratically determined decisions are binding on all members, although it accepts both the right for dissenters to debate and attempt to change policy, so long as they adhere to decisions, or to withdraw from the General Union [The Platform, 1989, 34 & White, 1990, 25]. The relationship between the member to the General Union is a contractual one, and it differs little from the forms of Kantian, binding obligation approved by minimal-statists and anarcho-capitalists. These agreements are rejected by the anarchists ideal as merely another form of constraining exchange which is incompatible with the free, spontaneous associations of communism (see Chapter 2 in particular Sections 4.1.1 and 4.1.2). The Platform posits a contractual obligation that is contrary to the aims of anarchism and therefore its organisational structures are not prefigurative.

Other class-struggle anarchists have condemned the AWG's organisational approach. The ACF, for instance, maintained that the anarchist organisation must be prefigurative having those characteristics aspired for in a post-revolutionary society; 'complete autonomy, and independence, and therefore full responsibility, to individuals and groups' [Organise! No. 27, 16].⁴⁸ The ACF claim that because the centralised committee holds power 'the AWG froze the relation between the anarchist militant and the mass' [Organise!, No. 29, 11]. A minority who was most conscious in one context was considered able to represent the interests of others from different contexts. Consequently the AWG concentrated their efforts on developing the enlightened cadre rather than participating in direct action against their own immediate oppression, in the same way that Leninists concentrate on the party [Organise!, No. 29, 11]. In place of The Platform, the ACF advocate the organisational principles found in The Manifesto of Libertarian Communism (henceforth The Manifesto) written by George Fontenis.

3.2. Federalism and the Manifesto

The ACF recognise that the centralism recommended by the AWG was inappropriate as an anarchic social arrangement. '[N]o organisation can be anarchist without total freedom to take part in the formulation of goals, aims and methods plus, ultimately, the right to withdraw from this process' [Organise! No. 27, 16]. Yet, the proposal found in their organisational recommendations and The Manifesto in particular differs only slightly from that in The Platform. Like the Dileo Trouda Group, Fontenis also recognises that the Leninist method of imposing tactical and theoretical views from outside is repressive. Yet his solution is similar to The Platform, in that it too stresses the need for 'Ideological Unity', 'Tactical Unity' and 'Collective Action and Discipline' [Fontenis, 1991, 13]. The Manifesto also identifies a vanguard who can best represent 'the experiences and desires of the masses' [Fontenis, 1991, 8]. There are important differences between The Manifesto and The Platform which are indicative of the first's more prominent libertarian attitude: (1) The Manifesto stresses federation rather than the central committee as the final arbitrator of authority. (2) Internal relationships are less dependant on deontological contractual relations.

(1) The ACF supporters of The Manifesto applaud its greater stress on the autonomy of local groups. They promote federalism, in which: 'Political power flows from the base to the summit' [Organise! No. 27, 16]. Local units have ultimate responsibility for the tactics in their regions and therefore allow for tactics, organisations and agents that respond to the micropolitical. Although The Platform also proclaims an adherence to federalism the binding nature of the Executive's decisions permits only small degrees of latitude in the manner of execution [The Platform, 1989, 33].

(2) The contractual obligations of members to the group are less rigid in The Manifesto. Constituent sections may dissent from the majority decision yet still retain membership of the federation without being forced to carry out the obligations. However this only goes so far as abstention; they may not perform acts contrary to the central decision, so are still contractually restricted. Like local groups in The Platform each unit has the freedom to secede at any time [Organise! No. 27, 16]. Anarchist-communists are not the only libertarians who favour federalism over centralism. SolFed and other syndicalists such as Tom Brown espouse the diffusion of power to localised autonomous groups federating into larger groupings as both the means and ends of anarchism [Brown, 1990, 83-3].

3.3. Networks

The network makes more explicit what is implicit in the federalist proposal of the ACF, namely that authority lies in localised groups that come together on the basis of mutual self-interest. No agreement ties them into tactical unity. Where groups wish to carry out separate actions they are free to do so, unbound by the decisions of other local groups. Some have proposed a network model but called it a

'federation'.⁴⁹ Examples of the network include Reclaim the Streets that bring together interested individuals and groups on environmental themes. Participants join up on various projects placing their own emphasis on planned actions. J18 was a case in point. Different groups voluntarily came together for mutual interest in pursuing the oppressive forces that directly affect them. MA'M used the event to confront the totems of deference to a sovereign, environmental groups to oppose businesses which harm their communities, class-struggle communist groups the institutions of banking and finance (such as the LIFFE building) and workplace activists attacked the reformist TUC headquarters. These targets intersect, providing avenues of solidarity and co-operation.

In a network, if a particular activity is considered by a participant to be inappropriate they are free either to abstain or even undertake opposing action outside of the network. It would still be possible for them to rejoin in other events that did meet their later requirements. This method of organisation has prefigurative elements favourable to anarchists. It employs a free contract and allows for greater flexibility of operation. It does not involve a universal vanguard, offers free and equal access to any wishing to participate and does not, ideally, have a centralised leadership. There are a few provisos. Some bodies calling themselves 'networks' have either an official centralised leadership, or a covert de facto one. Additionally following the success of J18, members of state socialist groups such as Workers' Power and the SWP have tried to join libertarian networks, such as those around N30 and Mayday 2000 (fig. 4.3.). Attitudes to such interventions have varied according to locality and the people who are members of these parties. In some locations individual orthodox marxists have been provisionally accepted as they have, in practice, behaved in accordance with the network's principles and have not tried to impose Leninist methods, in other places those who joined did attempt to dictate a strategic politics and, as a result, they were excluded.

Networks are not a universal organisational method. It is only suitable for certain forms of (anti-)political action. It cannot be applied to all libertarian action, or to all contexts. In particularly oppressive circumstances where free association is difficult or impossible or where tactics require little formal discussion, networks are not a suitable form.

3.4. The Closed Cell

If the free network embodies many of the features that prefigure the anarchist-ideal, the closed cell is regarded as its antithesis. However, notable anarchists have advocated and supported it, the most infamous being Nechaev. The disapprobation towards this organisational structure is partly a result of its close association with terrorist tactics, a method normally regarded as incompatible with prefiguration. Although propaganda by deed is generally disapproved of in anarchist circles, especially the more academic ones, certain types of cell-structure can be justified as concordant with a prefigurative ethic.⁵⁰ It can be the most appropriate organisational form to carry out certain tactics in specific circumstances. Before examining these exceptions, it is necessary to elucidate why this form of structure is considered to be outside the anarchist ideal.

The cell structure for revolutionary organisation was first fully formulated by Nechaev in his 1869 work Catechism of the Revolutionist, a work which many commentators consider to be abhorrent and has caused its author universal denunciation [Avrich, 1987, 11 & Morland, 1997, 95]. The particular features of the cell organisation proposed by Nechaev include the worst characteristics of the most authoritarian institutions. The starting point is that the cell is to be comprised of a few individuals, who form a vanguard of committed revolutionaries. 'The revolutionary is a dedicated man (sic.). He has no interests of his own affairs, no attachments, no belongings, not even a name. Everything in him is absorbed by a single exclusive interest, a single thought, a single passion - revolution.' [Nechaev, 1989, 4].⁵¹ This specialisation and distancing from one's community is out of step with contemporary anarchism, where the revolutionary is not an expert, but someone undivorced from the everyday.⁵² For Nechaev the revolutionary is concerned only in insurrection and socialises only within the cell.

Each cell would be arranged so that only one person, the 'organiser', would be in contact with other cells, providing this person with unchecked power within the cell. The organiser would also be the sole contact with the 'committee', the co-ordinating body of the cell network [Nechaev, 1989, 2-3] It is no surprise that Nechaev set himself up as the central figure in his own gang Narodnya Rasprava [Fishman, 1970, 13]. The insularity and the hierarchy of the organisation had two purposes; first to ensure unity and second to protect the group's internal security.

Nechaev's aim was to create a united, disciplined revolutionary organisation under one person's control [Prawdin, 1961, 67]. His strategic response prefigured his totalitarian ambition of a thoroughly directed utopia in which the revolutionary leaders manage the masses. The new harmonious society was under threat by the organisations enemies and required tight control to prevent breeches in security, as Clarke explains:

Under this plan, no member, save the co-ordinator ['organiser'], knew the names of more than a small selection of his [sic.] comrades. Thus, if a cell was infiltrated by an Ochrana spy [tsarist secret police], or if one of the comrades turned traitor, he could only destroy his own group and not the entire operation [Clarke, 1983, 33].

Nechaev felt that such organisational arrangements

⁵² 'There is no such thing as a full-time "professional" revolutionary, although there are people who think they are! We are 'amateurs' and combine revolutionary work with everyday life. In the process we change and so do our lives' [Class War, 1992, 12-13].

were vital for the tactics necessary to achieve his aims, such as bombings and assassinations. Open revolutionary activity risked long prison sentences, extra-legal summary execution and extradition.

The central objective of the conspiracy of cells was to worm its members into all parts of capitalist social life including, if possible 'the Third Section [the Secret Police] and even the Winter Palace'. The cells were to use all and every means at their disposal to subvert and destroy state institutions, especially those responsible for repression and torture [Nechaev, 1989, 7]. Nechaev's strategy recommends revolutionary cells as the best method for revolutionaries to avoid detection for as long as possible and promote through their leadership an uncompromising war of destruction against society [Nechaev, 1989, 10]. Cell organisation offers internal unity and consequently many different political movements have used it. In Britain the most notable are the Provisional Irish Republican Army (IRA) and their predecessors the Irish Fenian Brotherhood.

For libertarians the main weakness of cell organisation in general (and not just Nechaev's particular version), lies in its elitism both between the leaders at the centre of the cell organisation and the lower ranking minions and between those in the conspiracy and those excluded. The hierarchical nature of the cells makes it a suitable form of organisation for those who wish to impose an authoritarian form of society. Eldridge Cleaver, whose was at one time the Minister of Information for the Black Panthers, was so impressed by Nechaev's work that he considered The Catechism of the Revolutionary to be his political bible [Cleaver, 1984, 25]. Leninists approve of the organisational division because it replicates their strategic difference between the vanguard (co-ordinators) who are at the centre of directing operations and the ordinary cell members who do not even know the leadership.

The cell also acts as a representative of the oppressed by carrying out actions which, because of their illegality, the 'clients' can know little about, nor apply much influence. The claustrophobia of the cell structure means that the membership loses connection with the community that they live amongst. Even for social and sometimes sexual relations the cell was to be the centre of the individual's life [Nechaev, 1989, 10]. The closed organisation of the cell is intended to block the gaze of oppressive power, but it also obstructs the cell from the view of the oppressed and prevents the from participating in (anti-)political action. Attack International in The Spirit of Freedom criticise the IRA on the grounds that the members of the cell are separate from the class they wish to inspire, a point that is repeated by the ACF and Subversion. The terrorist cell is a vanguard elite with the monopoly of armaments and equipment, thereby restricting the autonomous activity of the oppressed [Organise! No. 31, 16 & Subversion No. 12, 16].⁵³

Although cell organisation is supposed to be immune to state intrusion it is particularly prone to the activities of agent provocateurs. The habit of obeisance and subservience to organisers and co-ordinators make it easier for the spy to persuade the lower members of the cells into committing acts which could turn public opinion against libertarianism. The necessarily disparate nature of the cells makes it hard to distinguish rogue groups from legitimate ones.⁵⁴ Cells are not in direct contact with each other, so do not know whether a particular act was performed by one of its allied cells or a false one set up by state agents. Thus, as the former SI member Gianfranco Sanguinetti argues, in reference to the Italian Red Brigades: 'Any secret service can invent revolutionary" initials for itself and undertake a certain number of outrages, which the press will give good publicity to, and after which, it will be easy to form a small group of militants, that it will direct with the utmost ease' [Sanguinetti, 1982, 58]. The gaps in responsibility and co-ordination that result from highly entrenched secrecy and hierarchy provides exploitable opportunities for the state. Thus, anarchists argue, cells cannot be used for libertarian ends, as they are hierarchical organisations that claim to act on behalf of the oppressed and impose one strategic co-ordinating structure. Structures that fix unequal distributions of power are suitable only for elite actions and prefigure autocratic ends.

⁵⁴ The infiltration of existing cells and the creation of rogue cells has been a basis for one of

Despite the origins of secretive cell-structures and their general approbation, class-struggle anarchist have supported some cell-structured activity. In the first dozen years of the century Lettish social revolutionaries, often described as 'anarchists' were organised in cells and carried out politically motivated crimes, the Siege of Sidney Street being their most infamous event. In the 1970s and early 80s the distinctly anarchist Angry Brigades (AB) and Animal Liberation Fronts (ALF) cell-based groupings were active. Class War during the 1984-5 miners' strike proclaimed 'Victory to the Hit Squads', which the libertarian criticisms of cell structures as well as a warning of how far sections of the state will go in order to protect their interests. The authors of Like A Summer With A Thousand July's cite the case of the Littlejohn brothers who were hired by trusted elements of Edward Heath's Conservative Government to infiltrate the IRA and to commit bank raids in the Irish Republic in the name of Nationalist cause. The aim was to provoke anti-IRA feeling in the twenty-six counties [Wolfie, Speed, et. al., 1982, 12].

were groups of miners' who carried out secretive acts of sabotage [Class War 'Victory to the Hit Squads' edition, 1 & 3]. Such advocacy need not contradict prefigurative principles, for there are certain subtle distinctions between these cells and the closed cell groups modelled on Nechaev's principles.

3.5. Open Cell

To avoid the possibility of an elite force mediating between the masses and their liberation, contemporary libertarian terrorist groups have attempted to evolve new forms of organisation. Although they are intended to be different to the formal structures used by statist freedom fighters, in many cases the types of tactics they have used have led to insularity of the cell-structure. The effort to avoid the elitism of traditional terrorist methods has prompted clear distinctions between authoritarian and libertarian cell-structures, which will be referred to here respectively as closed- and open-cells. These differences have often been overlooked. Marshall, for instance, places the cell groups of the Angry Brigade (AB) in the same category as Leninist and Nationalist cell-groups [Marshall, 1992, 558].

According to Sadie Plant, there are significant differences in organisational practices and objectives that make the AB more powerful and threatening to the ruling class than the elitist urban guerrilla cells.

They promoted a sense of anonymity and ubiquity which earned them an inflated notoriety and side-stepped all attempts at easy definition, and although the majority of the attacks for which they claimed responsibility only involved the destruction of property, this was a strategy which also ended in long prison sentences [Plant, 1992, 126].

The AB was structured such that its membership was open. Anyone could be a member and no one was responsible for recruitment. People, who not in contact with each other but shared political aims, were encouraged to commit acts of violence, primarily against property. There are has four organisational differences between this cell-structure and that of the Nechaevian original. First, it does not require a vanguard but depends on local activists. Second, it avoids centralised hierarchical structure. Thirdly, this grouping is contingent on other organisations and tactics and does not have strategic primacy. Finally, this structure makes it hard for the security forces to identify the locus of opposition.

The open organisation dissolves distinctions between a revolutionary elite and 'the masses', allowing agents to act on their own behalf. An indication of the success of this organisational tactic is recognisable in the large number of outrages that were committed. Bunyan cites 123 attacks on property between March 1968 and August 1971 [Bunyan, 1983, 48]. Class War admired the hit squads because they were localised groups of the strikers' themselves [Class War 'Victory to the Hit Squads' edition, 3]. The provisional, informal nature of the open cells, made up of friends, colleagues and neighbours required no hierarchies. The mining communities' support of the hit-squads actions and the wider, and larger libertarian milieu in which the AB first operated, made the stress of clandestine activity unnecessary. At first no distance opened up between an active elite and the wider oppressed community, especially as all could carry out their own actions.⁵⁵ The hit squads took place against the background of a general insurrection in the coal-fields. These gangs were a minor, albeit useful, supportive feature of a larger set of conflict. In Attack International's graphic novel Breaking Free, the hero Tintin (satirically based on Herge's original) and his friend Charlie are striking labourers who secretly burn down the site where scabs (replacement workers) have been bussed in [Daniels, 1989, 120]. The book also contains sympathetic characters who were involved in physical assaults on the organisers of strike-breaking labour [Daniels, 1989, 80]. The approved small, flexible groups are set up in support of a wider set of liberatory acts, which sabotage assists rather than replaces or leads.⁵⁶ The hit squads encourage others to undertake their forms of action and are not regarded as pivotal or structures to represent the views of others. The closed cell-based structures by contrast see their organisations and their acts, as the vanguard.

The accessible nature of the open cell, in which membership is based on acceptance of principle rather than on formal recruitment means that anyone regardless of location could participate. As one AB communiqué put it: 'The AB is the man or woman sitting next to you' [Angry Brigade, Communiqué 9, 1984, 32]. This clearly inspired a large number of people to perform anti-political acts. The police had great problems in trying to discover the perpetrators due to the anonymity and fluidity of the groups. Alongside the Angry Brigade, there were others involved in the informal network, 1st May Group, Lotta Continua, the Wild Bunch, Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid and on the continent of Europe groups such as the Hash Rebels. These too were loose autonomous networks of friends and colleagues bent on damaging the state, by carrying out acts of violence on property. The Angry Brigade recognised the multitude of sites of power within contemporary society, and consequently attacked and supported action on a variety of fronts, often in a supportive role, such as blowing up the homes of industrialists during strikes or Spanish embassies in co-operation with Spanish anti-fascists.

'Frank: Yeh, but it ain't a substitute for Workers taking action....

'Jim: Well who said it was?

Yet, even open cell groups can become rigid, and as circumstances change move towards a closed cell structure. Bommi Baumann, a member of the (West) German Hash Rebels, points out when the group became more embroiled in illegal acts it became isolated and replicated the party-class distinction of Leninism.

Because you are illegal, you can't keep your contact with the people at the base. You no longer take part directly in any further development of the whole scene. You're not integrated with the living process that goes on....

Consequently, the group becomes increasingly closed. The greater the pressure from the outside, the more you stick together, the more mistakes you make, the more pressure is turned inward [Baumann, 1975, 98].

The insularity necessary to a small group bent on illegal actions, without mass popular support, tends towards elitism. As a result of the separation between elite and mass, the actions of the terrorist group can only be interpreted through the medium of the mainstream, capitalist press, which is always hostile. Faced with this hostility, the movement begins to reciprocate the animosity back onto the oppressed group from which they came but are now separated. The once open, flexible group, becomes more insular and static. AB members who committed criminal acts had to leave or hide from the community they lived amongst.

Under the onslaught of police raids, the conspirators began to stick together, seeing other people less, but using their houses clandestinely. "Your ideas start to be shared by a smaller and smaller group of people. You become isolated from mainstream actions and from socialising with other people" [Bradley, 1991, 7].

The police response to illegal actions and the desire to evade capture lead to the band becoming alienated from the people they wish to interact with.

Open cells were most suitable when combined with other forms of organisation rather than acting as the vanguard movement. Similarly so long as they were temporary enough to avoid the creation of new criminal elites, small cells made up of the oppressed agents themselves in a context of general community support were able to act in a libertarian manner. However historically, small anarchist militant groups have become distanced from the oppressed classes [Miller, 1984, 124]. In an effort to reconnect to the revolutionary classes of peasants and industrial workers, anarchists supported the building of structures based at what they considered the primary site of oppression, the workplace.

4. Workplace Organisation

One of the great schisms within class struggle anarchism has been between the libertarian communists and the anarcho-syndicalists, a disagreement which is said to date from the late nineteenth century [Woodcock, 1975, 18]. Many contemporary anarchists, from both sides, still maintain this demarcation. Bookchin, for instance complains that anarcho-syndicalism appeals to a 'marxist' agent - the industrial, employed workforce alone, a group which is too select for his municipal anarchism [Bookchin, 1993, 52]. The anarchist-communist ACF is critical of permanent workplace groupings because they become integrated, like unions, into the running of capitalism [ACF, 1997, 25]. The anarcho-syndicalists retort that their libertarian opponents have no effective revolutionary organisation and have consistently appealed to very few compared to the tens, sometimes hundreds of thousands who have been in anarchist syndicates.⁵⁷

While there are differences between these two groupings, it is possible for workplace and community organisation to be mutually consistent. Syndicalism, as communists such as Kropotkin recognised, can be a tactic compatible with anarchism [Kropotkin in Black Flag, No. 210, 26-7]. As will be discussed some anarcho-syndicalists still consider their organisations to be the necessary and key structure for creating the post-revolutionary world. Strategic workplace activists are incompatible with the anarchist ideal. However, some syndicalists today, such as SolFed resist elevating their organisation as a universal form and as such are consistent with the prefigurative ethic [see Appendix One]. Multiple responses which are a feature of the contemporary

Stuart Christie complained that the British anarchist movement of the early 1960s had no industrial base and was composed mainly of middle class liberals, while the Continental movements, especially in France and Spain were, because of their syndicalist origins, still rooted in the working class [Christie, 1980, 31].

anarchist movements (and are evident in previous anarchist movements), share with the anarchist ideal, the need for diverse organisation to confront numerous complex oppressions.

4.1. Syndicalism, Anarcho-syndicalism and Trade Unionism

Revolutionary syndicalists, such as Bill Haywood, tend towards 'economistic' theories, namely that the agents who will bring about change are primarily workers at the point of production. Industrial organisation and workplace tactics would provide the basis for a future just society. In this strategic 'economic' form syndicalists believed that political action was epiphenomenal that members were free to pursue whatever political action as they wish.⁵⁸ Variations on this form of syndicalism were commonplace [Holton, 1980, 8-11]. Some revolutionary syndicalists, such as Daniel De Leon held that a political party was ⁵⁸ As the Charter of Amiens (1906) expounds:

In the daily work of claiming better conditions the syndicate is seeking a co-ordination of work forces, a growth in the workers' well-being through the acquisition of immediate improvements such as the diminution of working hours, increase in salary etc.

But thus necessity is only one side of the work of syndicalism: it is a preparation for complete emancipation which can only come about through the expropriation of capital. This requires the general strike as a mode of action, and considers that the syndicate, today the form of resistance groups, will tomorrow be groups of production and distribution, the foundation of social organisation....

Consequently, as far as individuals are concerned, the Congress affirms complete freedom for any member of the syndicate to participate outside it in whatever kind of struggle corresponds to his philosophical or political ideas, asking him in exchange not to introduce into the syndical organism the opinions expressed outside [Bonanno, 1978e, 27].

necessary to support the industrial movement. In other variations industrial organisation began to play a secondary role to the political party. In order to gain influence in parliament to protect the gains it had made the British trade unions founded the Labour Party, but the structure set up to protect the unions, in Hegelian fashion began to dominate the unions.

The attractions of syndicalism for anarchists is clear. It had a distinct, comprehensible organisational aim, the uniting of the working class into federated militant industrial bodies, hence the Industrial Workers' of the World (IWW or Wobblies) slogan of 'One Big Union'.⁵⁹ It also had a simple revolutionary tactic tied to this singular organisation, the general strike. Such a method also clearly identified the revolutionary subject, the worker at the point of production, where exploitation and class divisions were most evident. 'Anarcho-Syndicalism applies energy at the point of production; its human solidarity is cemented by the association of people in common production undiluted by mere groupings of opinion' [White, 1998, 7].⁶⁰ The workplace is a site where a myriad of effective tactics could be used against the oppressing class. The arsenal includes sabotage, strikes, occupations and boycotts. The great appeal of syndicalism, as Pierre Monatte a turn of the twentieth century advocate proclaimed, 'can be summed up in two words: direct action' [Monatte, 1980, 217]. Workplace organisation provides the opportunity for effective prefigurative tactics.

⁵⁹ The IWW are, strictly speaking, revolutionary syndicalists rather than anarcho-syndicalists. The difference is that while both reject political parties for direct workers' action in bringing about fundamental changes in social and economic relations, revolutionary syndicalists are not wedded to the vision of a future society based on libertarian communist principles [see Longmore, 1985, 6-7]. However the IWW and IWA in practice barely diverge as a result there has been discussion towards the possibility of a merger [Direct Action No.74, 8]. In Britain there are convivial relations between the two with SolFed favourably reporting IWW activities [see for instance Direct Action No. 76, 9; Direct Action No. 4, 21-2 and Direct Action No. 6, 28].

British Anarcho-syndicalism started as a variation on the purer form of revolutionary syndicalism. It too concentrated on economic activity, but this is not because it considered constitutional party politics to be uninfluential. As R. J. Horton and Richard Price suggest, even in their early twentieth century form, they did not neglect the state, but considered that constitutional practice would only lead to the development of new hierarchies, whilst industrial practice provide possibilities for alternative experiments in social organisation [Holton, 1980, 13-5 & Price, 1998, 264]. As a result the structures of anarchist syndicates try to reflect the anti-hierarchical aims. DAM, citing Rocker, proposed that there should be no professional union officials and no central direction for the industrial union but that decision-making should be participatory. Paid leaders, previously, have interests separate from their electorate and as result settle for deals that protect union representation rather than employees' jobs.

The organisation of anarcho-syndicalism is based on the principles of federalism, on free combination from below upward, putting the right of self-determination of every member above everything else and recognising only the organic agreement of all on the basis of like interests and common convictions [Rocker, 1990e, 53].⁶¹

Anarcho-syndicalists recognise that it is necessary to have a number of people performing particular duties such as writing minutes, chairing and publicising meetings and negotiating with other groups, yet believe it is possible to operate without creating new elites. In SolFed (formerly DAM)⁶² officials are temporary and almost always unpaid. Those in co-ordinating positions remain alongside the workforce and are not in an advantaged economic position. Even in very large syndicalist bodies such as the CNT where full-time paid positions could not be avoided, elected positions could not extend beyond one year and wages were tied to parity with the workers [Rocker, 1990e, 53 & Direct Action No. 74, 10].

The creation of workers' associations that have distinctive participatory structures is partly a result of an overt rejection of existing trade unions. Trade unions mediate between worker and employer and thus have to police any agreement and a responsibility to assist in disciplining rebellious members. Unions have an interest in maintaining capitalist relations as their position is based on the mediating role and become part of the machinery of control. At the top end general secretaries and presidents of trade unions are geographically and socially distinct from their members and are part of the social networks of the state.⁶³ Anarcho-syndicalists not only have different aims, the eradication of the current system of production and exchange, the domination of the state, and their replacement by free co-operation between workers' bodies but also distinctive organisational and tactical means [Rocker, 1990e, 80].⁶⁴ Anti-representational structures and rejection

⁶² SolFed are a member of the anarcho-syndicalist Internal Worker's Association, of which the CNT is the leading member.

⁶⁴ DAM (the forerunners of SolFed) in their 'Aims and Principles' explain that 'We are fighting to of constitutional activity are at their core.⁶⁵

The two further difference between unions and anarchist syndicates are that first, unions are organised predominantly on the basis of trade while syndicates are based on industry. For instance in hospitals white collar staff might be in UNISON, medics in the Royal College of Nurses and the British Medical Association, delivery drivers and domestics in the Transport and General Workers Union and technical staff such as radiographers in the Manufacturing and Science Federation. Anarcho-syndicalists try to unite staff within industries into a single union [Direct Action, No. 76, 12]. The other major difference is that in Britain currently seven million people are members of trade unions affiliated to the TUC, whilst members of specialist anarchist syndicates are counted in the dozens. Efforts to create an anarcho-syndicalist union for previously unorganised dispatch riders in 1989 collapsed in the early 1990s after just a few years. Consequently this has lead to a change in organisational approach amongst contemporary syndicalists. Instead of creating their own separate unions, SolFed are concentrating their efforts on creating networks of workers inside and outside of unions on an industrial basis to propagandise and to participate in struggles within those industries [Direct Action No. 1, 34].⁶⁶ As a result there is little organisational difference between contemporary abolish the state, capitalism and wage slavery in all forms and replace them by self-managed production for need, not profit' [DAM-IWA, 1991, 30].

⁶⁶ See too letter from Paul F. PSWN/DAM in Organise! No. 29, 10

anarcho-syndicalists and anarchists who operate through trade unions (such as TUNA), each recognises that multiple methods are required rather than a single organisational form.

Douglass, himself a trade union militant and a supporter both of radical action through specific anarchist workplace, identifies the advantages of multiform structures. He explains that employing manifold methods is not contradictory, but based on employing whatever structure works best in resisting oppression in a given situation.

Workers [...] will drive the trade union bus in whatever direction they want to go, no matter what it says on the front. And while it wasn't constructed for, say, charging police roadblocks, from time to time it is the nearest thing to hand and will do until something stronger comes along. This bus may not take us as far as we want to go... but in many cases we can take it as far as it will go, at which point we'll adapt it or change it for something else [Douglass, 1991, 11].

4.2. Against Workplace Organisation

There are three main criticisms of revolutionary workplace organisation. The first is that it is necessarily reformist. The second picks out an apparent vanguardism, with one site for organisation and those who are located within it are prioritised over all others. Finally, rather than unifying the working class as the aim of 'One Big Union' suggests, it divides it between industries and between workers and non-workers. It will be shown that while these criticisms do have some validity against particular forms of syndicalism, the ideal type of post-structuralist anarchist organisation avoids these criticisms but can still support industrial organisation.

4.2.1. Workplace Groups as Reformist

Libertarians, particularly from the council communist tradition have been particularly critical of trade unions and consequently anarchist syndicates. As was seen in Section 1.2. councilists argue that pre-existing organisations become co-opted into capitalism. Any grouping whether it is a trade union or revolutionary syndicate, that negotiates with management helps to settle the price for wage-labour and thereby assists exploitation. As result it is inherently a structure that assists capitalist domination [Martin, 1998e, 58].⁶⁷ While trade unions, now-a-days, are keen to show that they are non-radical organisations, concentrating on constitutional pressure, legal support and selling services to members, anarcho-syndicalists by contrast are explicitly revolutionary. However, anarcho-syndicates also arbitrate with management, as a result they too will be integrated into the structure of administration or else fail in their function as negotiating bodies. Consequently no matter how radical the union or syndicate it would have to behave in the same way as trade unions, disciplining the work force into accepting managerially agreed decisions.

A steward who is a revolutionary cannot last, either they will be drawn into the union apparatus through the day-to-day accommodation with management that they have to negotiate for - or they will 'go too far' for the members and lose the ability to do a good job as a steward [Anti-Exchange and Mart, 8].

Both trade unions and syndicates are identical in that, once they start negotiating a fairer rate of exploitation, they are open to the risk of incorporation into management. Any deal has to be patrolled to ensure that future bargains can be entered into. Radical groupings change into order-making and enforcing roles, supporting hierarchical arrangements.

The councilist criticisms are valid where groups represent and accept, through negotiation, the rules of capitalist domination they are behaving hierarchically. Nonetheless not all workplace groups will negotiate with management and hence avoid having to discipline other employees.⁶⁸ Similarly, as Douglass has pointed out, even reformist trade unions, when their rank-and-file members are radicalised can ignore the leadership and engage in consistent anti-hierarchical activity. These are carried out both through their existing structures such as the defeat of the 1972 Industrial Relations Act, and by acts outside of the unions such as the hit squads [Douglass, 1999, 81 & Douglass, 1991, 11]. Autonomous workers' struggle may start in trade unions or existing syndicates but through use of direct action, the oppressed groups create new organisational structures that in their ideal forms embody anarchist principles.

4.2.2. The Vanguard

The prefigurative characteristic of anarchist syndicates is twofold. First, its non-hierarchical federalist structures, which are replicated in SolFed's current industrial networks, are supposed to be synecdochic of social relations after the revolution. The second characteristic is more important, for not only does the workplace organisation embody the principles of the future revolutionary community, but it is also the proposed controlling body for future society. As the preamble to the IWW Constitution explains 'By organising industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old' [Q. Bread & Roses, Issue 2, Winter 97/98, 3]. There are considerable problems with the classical syndicalist view of the IWW. It assumed that the syndicates had an ahistorical form. Critics rightly point out that the conditions that bring about revolutionary organisations are a product of alienating conditions, reifying that form would preserve those conditions. New methods of struggle might need to supersede the syndicates, just as Douglass recognised they might (necessarily) outgrow the unions. As Miller correctly points out to be genuinely liberatory 'syndicates, therefore, must disappear along with the society that had given birth to them; otherwise they would become a force of stagnation' [Miller, 1984, 131]. Revolutionary struggle involves superseding and developing new forms of social relations, not freezing them.⁶⁹ Hence the syndicates would not be the basis for the new society.

Like the Communist Party bureaucracy having strategic centrality in the reorganisation of post-revolutionary society, syndicates are seen as being core institutional forms, rather than fluid examples of anarchist principles. The Leninist's strategy of a party directing the proletariat is not abolished by strategic versions of anarcho-syndicalism, but merely replaced by workplace federation, as in evidence in the slogan: 'The union not party' [Direct Action No. 76, 12]. One vanguard is substituted for another. This criticism equally applies to trade union anarchists who would see these organisations as having strategic primacy. Yet contemporarily, there has been a move away from such organisational arrangements. There have been many syndicalists who regard the workplace organisation as the primary necessary means for waging the class war, amongst them the Hull-based Syndicalist Alliance and the British section of the IWW.⁷⁰ The latter states: 'The sooner we get one big industrial united front, in or out of the existing unions, the bloody better. [... T]he workplace is the only place where workers have any real economic power' [Bread & Roses No. 2, Winter 97/98, 4].

Most contemporary anarcho-syndicalists and trade union anarchists do not consider that their organisations should have strategic primacy at all times and under all conditions. The anarcho-syndicalist Meltzer in his final article before his death in 1996, accepts that 'the struggle to achieve workers' control is not the whole answer' [Meltzer, 1996, 16]. Syndicates and other work-based organisations are not universally appropriate methods though they can play a leading role in struggles against oppression in particular circumstances. The anarchist ideal involves a multi-varied organisational approach. The different forms of workplace structures are responsive to distinct contexts, counteract the local repressive practices and are established by oppressed groups in specific situations.

The activities of the Liverpool Dock-strikers (which began in 1995) and the Zapatistas rebellion (reaching public prominence at the start of 1994) are good examples of the multivaried approach. The dock's dispute originated with the actions of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company to which the trade unions responded. Although links with the union were not entirely broken despite the abandonment by the Transport and General Workers Union (TGWU) officers of their members, the dockers sought lines of solidarity which stretched beyond the traditional routes of organised labour [Simon, 1998, 8-9]. As the Secretary and Chairman of the Mersey Docks Shop Stewards Committee wrote:

We are now proud to be joined by the thousands of people throughout the country who want to safeguard the world against the evils brought by exploitation for profit: deforestation, poisonous land, rivers and roads, infected animals and crops and dangerous dumping of toxic waste.

And the thousands leading the fight against the government's Criminal Justice Act, Anti-Asylum and Job Seeker's Allowance legislation.

We thank Reclaim the Future (RTF) organisers for their patience and respect towards our committee, and towards all the sacked dockers and their families [Dockers Charter, No. 28, September 1996, 1].

The dockers linked up with environmental protestors and those whose freedom was further restricted by government legislation brought in to protect and enhance neo-liberal economic policies.⁷¹ The Zapatistas also created new frameworks of solidarity, establishing networks of support amongst and between different oppressed subject groups.

Neoliberalism is not an economic policy but an attempt to reorganise every aspect of human life. Neoliberalism destroys everything, but at the same time there arises new forms of resistance and struggle. They are no longer the struggle of the masses, but a new rainbow of different struggles, the struggles of women, the struggles of the gay movement, struggles to redefine the relation between people and nature, struggles for the rights of people in all phases of their lives, as children, adolescents, old people, struggles just to survive, struggles that are not perceived or recognised as struggles, struggles that, taken individually, are partial but that, seen all together, point towards the construction of human dignity [Pelaez & Holloway, 1996, 62]

There is no objective position from which to predict precisely which categories of people will be oppressed by the expansion of free market practices and what subject identities will be created. Neither is it possible to foretell what forms of resistance will be adapted or which groups will coalesce in networks of solidarity.

4.2.3. Privileging the Industrial Worker

The aim of uniting the working class through federated unions, a feature of both anarcho-syndicalists and revolutionary syndicalists, is criticised by Malatesta as divisive. Strategic industrial organisation segregates by either trade or industry. Additionally syndicalists are accused of prioritising the industrial worker [Bookchin, 1993, 49]. As was noted in the discussion of the 'social factory' surplus value is created not just in the industrial setting, but also in the wider community as well. Further classical syndicalism of 'one big union' assumes that capitalist economics is the sole locus of subjugating power.

These criticisms, especially the latter two, would suggest that syndicalism and trade union based anarchist currents had not thrown off Leninist views of power, and consequently retain a strategic organisational approach. However, developments in contemporary anarchist workplace organisation, which are close to the anarchist ideal, manage to avoid these weaknesses. SolFed recognise that interests extend beyond particular industries, thereby attempting to combine organisations of different sectors into networks of support. So too, as even critics of anarcho-syndicalism, such as the WSM point out, syndicalists organised beyond the productive setting.

Critics who reject syndicalism on the grounds that it cannot organise those outside the workplace are wrong. Taking the example of anarcho-syndicalism in Spain it is clear that they could and did organise throughout the entire working class as was evidenced by the Iberian Federation of Libertarian Youth, the 'Mujeras Liberes' (Free Women), and the neighbourhood organisations [Red & Black, No. 1, 30].

Similarly SolFed attempts to set up 'locals'. These are community organisations that concern themselves with struggles based on local interests, not just on the basis of production. 'A Local is also a base for action on a wider social agenda, not simply for supporting workplace activity' [SolFed, 1994e, 3]. Neighbourhood groups are necessary because 'the class war also takes place on the working class streets and housing estates' [Education Worker, No. 3, Summer 1995, 3].⁷²

Similarly the 'Aims of the Solidarity Federation' suggests that there are other forms of oppression which require their own forms of localised organisation, although SolFed does suggest a single location from which these oppressive forces originate:

[N]ot all oppression is economic, but can be based on gender, race sexuality, or anything else our rulers find useful. Unless we organise in this way, politicians - some claiming to be revolutionary - will be able to exploit us for their own ends [Direct Action No. 1, 34].

The original strategic organisation of syndicalism and other forms of anarchist industrial organisation has been replaced by a multiform approach compatible with the anarchist ideal. Criticisms of anarcho-syndicalism have been overcome by recognising that certain forms of oppression require distinctive, flexible responses not amenable to industrial organisation.

4.3. Syndicalism and Other Forms of Organisation

The standard explanation of the supposed split in anarchist ranks lies in the historical background that led to the development of anarcho-syndicalism. The 1880s saw a growth in individual acts of violence carried out by small groups of anarchists, acts which prominent libertarians such as Pouget, believed did not further the emancipation of the working classes [Woodcock, 1975, 294]. In its place new practical responses were considered, the most desirable, at that time, was the move towards industrial organisation [Miller, 1984, 129]. This development is presented by Marshall as the creation of a new (anti-)political hegemony within Western anarchism, a shift from the small groups of insurrectionists associated with the early anarchist communists (such as Malatesta) to a broader popular organisation promoted by the syndicalists [Marshall, 1992, 351-2].

The development of syndicalism amongst anarchists is regarded as a product of the failures of cell-based movements. As discussed earlier cells were thought to cause an elitist division between the revolutionaries and the subjugated class, which was far from the prefigurative archetype. The hierarchical relationship between the active terrorist agent and the passive 'client' class occurs predominantly when propaganda by deed becomes the main method of struggle at the expense of other tactics. For some anarchists, particular in France such as the Bonnot Gang, propaganda by deed did become the central strategy, fixed at the top of a hierarchy of methods [Parry, 1987].

It has been suggested that new industrial methods were advanced to replace the exclusivity of small groups operations [Miller, 1984, 129]. However, this view is mistaken, as it is not a matter of either/or (cells or syndicates), but of different combinations of organisational tactics applying according to the legal and social practices pertaining in each context. In France, after the murderous repression of the Paris Commune, in which an estimated 30,000 communards were executed, and the consequential legal restrictions on workers' movements, mass organisation was impossible. It was not until the Waldeck-Rousseau Law in 1884 that even trade union activity was decriminalised in France [Mitchell, 1990, 26]. In Britain because trade unions had been in existence for longer, the Miners' Association (the forebear to the NUM) was formed in 1844, there had been less need for propaganda by deed and the groupings associated with it.⁷³

Workplace activity was not simply a reaction against other organisational forms, but as Clifford Harper argues the 'whiff of dynamite' furnished by the propagandists by deed gave the workers the confidence to develop workplace organisations based on direct action and motivated the government into liberalisation [Harper, 1987, 68].⁷⁴ Even after the legalisation of syndicates, propaganda by deed continued, and after the Francoist victory the mass anarcho-syndicalist movement in Spain had to mutate into secretive 'underground' bodies to survive the fascist reaction [Black Flag No. 211, 16]. Consistent with the anarchist ideal, libertarians have used multiple organisation rather than awarding strategic priority to one structure or method. Rather than mass workplace organisation being a reaction to smaller cells, there are clear parallels between them. As Mitchell indicates, they both promoted direct action at the site of oppressive circumstances by the subjugated themselves [Mitchell, 1987, 29].

⁷⁴ See too Mitchell, 1990, 27

5. Community Organisation

Anarchists have shifted away from the traditional anarcho-syndicalist strategic concern with creating prefigurative alternatives in the workplace. In Bone's words the 'physical community [... is] the main focus of resistance rather than the workplace' [Bone, 1997, 8]. The change in direction was in part a result of the effectiveness by successive governments, starting with the Thatcher administration of 1979, in restraining class conflict at the point of production. The economic restructuring of Britain during the 1980s, marked by the eventual crushing of the militant miners, prompted a search for other areas of confrontation [Ryan, 1987, 12].⁷⁵ Such zones of conflict have in recent years been largely, but not exclusively based on environmental issues. Changes the sites of resistance can lead to the creation of a new strategic location outside of the workplace and a new vanguard. In the ideal form however, anarchist community structures are flexible and multiform. They often combine with, or are partly constituted in, industrial organisation and other forms of struggle.

There are a number of problems in discussing 'community organisation', because of ambiguities about what is meant by the term. For Tom Knoche, an American activist, community organisation are specific types of structures based on geographically peculiar terrain, which are run by the people resident in these areas [Knoche, 1996, 350-3].⁷⁶ For many British anarchists such as Class War, it appears to be any grouping which is not based in the workplace.⁷⁷ Community action might appear to be privileging non-occupational based organisation. Bone stressed organising outside of the workplace, although he considered this was due to specific, historically contingent and localised conditions, not a universal rule [Bone, 1997, 8].⁷⁸ Other anarchists, such as older anarcho-syndicalists have regarded community groups as only subservient adjuncts to the more important workplace based revolutionary union. Tom Brown suggested that those members of the working class who had left the workforce and did not wish to return (identified in his day as married women) could support workplace agitation through communal work [Brown, 1990, 57].

Libertarians such as autonomists widen the function of the community. Just as the search for surplus value involves various types of informal labour not normally identified as work, so too the pay for such toil comes in more forms than a formal salary. Consequently battles such as non-workplace struggles against benefit cuts or wages for housework are considered an equal part of the wider economic battle for the 'social wage'. Benefits, National Health Service and various legal rights are part of the informal negotiated social wage wrought by previous class struggles [Aufheben, 1998, 7-8]. So community groups created to enhance or, more recently, just protect the post-war welfare settlement are engaged in a section of the economic struggle, albeit in a wider set of contexts than traditional industrial battles.⁷⁹

Although Aufheben ascribe equal importance to community-based action, they still consider it as auxiliary to the wider economic battle. 'The revolutionary movement is grounded in the basic contradictions of wage labour as the essence of capital' [Aufheben, 1998, 8]. Other conflicts such as those community or 'cultural' forms of social movements like the hippies or punks are only important for Aufheben when they oppose the commodity form as did the squatters movement [Aufheben, 1998, 8]. The strategic centrality assigned to the economic base is understandable as it the dominant oppressive force in most contexts, at least in most contexts that Aufheben

⁷⁹ Cleaver describes how work has extended beyond the traditional workplace still regards the economic as the strategic ground.

[M]ilitary violence, starvation and the violence of incarceration as well as spectacle (TV, movies, sports) and brainwashing (politics, school) [...] all of these are geared to either getting people into work or getting rid of those who won't. These methods all appear to be operations carried on at the periphery of formal waged work with the aim of reinforcing its power to organise people's time and energy. But when we examine these activities more closely we also realise that they perform the work of producing or reproducing labour power and in the process create a situation in which either the work of producing the commodity labour power or the work of producing other commodities take up as much of society's time as capital can impose [Cleaver, 1999, 8-9].

members operate, yet autonomists suggest that all subjugated identities are reducible to the economic ones. Consequently all liberated forms of organisation must be economic in character. As was shown in Chapter Three, in different locations different combinations of power operate which may not be wholly determined by the economic.⁸⁰ Blacks, gays and lesbians or women, face differing subjugating practices [Casey, 1987, 17]. The anarchist ideal, according to which, groups are formed by the oppressed subjects themselves and co-ordinate amongst themselves has been evident in a variety of local campaigns and most significantly in the anti-Poll Tax movement.

5.1. The Structure of Community Based Groups

Community structures are as diverse as those based in the workplace. They can be centralised, small cell or federated. They are often in flux, changing their structure depending on the scale and enthusiasm of participants and types of oppressive practice they seek to undermine. As the ACF recount, the campaigns they are involved in can include squatting, opposition to the Criminal Justice Act, unemployment issues such as the Job Seekers Allowance, anti-Poll Tax work, opposition to council and government collaboration with big business - wrecking our environment by building roads through where we live and giving land to supermarket chains to build yet more superstores - housing projects, resistance to the closure and under funding of community facilities as well as in creative and cultural projects [ACF, 1997, 23-4].

The activists in each grouping, as Darren Ryan stresses, must be the locals rather than interlopers coming in to run it on their behalf [Ryan, 1987, 15-8]. Different campaigns will involve distinct structures and different participants, although there may be overlapping participants or aims, and it is through these shared interests that co-operative solidarity develops.

The practicality and flexibility of community action in overthrowing the Poll Tax contrasts with Leninist groups such as the SWP, who maintained that only action based in the workplace could be effective [Trotwatch, 1993, 29-30]. The autonomy of community bodies in which the people in each locality control their campaigns was also opposed by another orthodox marxist party, Militant, who believed that an objective strategy should be determined and applied paternalistically to all local anti-poll tax unions (APTUs). Consequently the flexible and informal, participatory nature of the non-aligned APTUs differed from the hierarchical structures of Militant based anti-poll tax groups [Burns, 1992, 74-5]. In areas where an APTU would have been successfully set up, but would not assist in party recruitment, Militant withdraw its support [Subversion No. 11, 12]. Through greater local involvement, without being wedded to a predetermined strategy, groups were able to create informal networks of support and tactics determined at the local level which were more suitable to creating neighbourhood support [Hounslow APT Campaign in Class War No. 45, 4]. These groups assisted in the maintenance of the successful non-payment tactic and proved, despite their smaller scale and lack of finance to be more successful than Militant's groups. An example of the success of the non-aligned groups was the assistance provided to the Trafalgar Square Defence Committee (TSDC) controlled by those arrested during the March 31st 1990 riot [Burns, 1992, 107-9]. The TSDC provided legal and financial assistance to poll tax detainees long after the community charge was abolished.

The success of the APTUs in co-ordinating local actions and creating networks of solidarity inspired the creation of informal networks of community activists based in regions. The first of these groupings, Brighton's Rebel Alliance, links a host of local campaigning groups from environmental, animal welfare, unemployed, anti-racist and formal anarchist movements. The network allows for groups to meet up, share information and collaborate in action without any group having to compromise its autonomy. This local network system has been replicated, with regional differences, in London, Manchester, Nottingham and Norwich.

5.2. Environmental Groups: Tribes and Communities

There is insufficient space to provide a thorough examination of British environmental movements during the period of the study. Groups as diverse as CND, Earth Liberation Front (ELF), EF!, Friends of the Earth (FoE), GenetiX Snowball, Greenpeace, Green Party, London Greenpeace, Hunt Saboteurs Association and RTS have all been influenced by, and inspired, libertarians to a greater or lesser degree. A wide range of political and anti-political philosophies are advanced in anarchist environmental movements from the social ecology of Bookchin to the primitivism of Booth, though some environmentalists reject the pertinence of capitalism and class as repressive forces [Do or Die, No. 8, 157]. A separate study would be required to do justice to these groups, the many other informal networks of ecological activists and their varied analyses and doctrines. This section just touches upon some of the different organisational methods.

Although not all the anarchists recognise environmental concerns as important sites of struggle, regarding these issues, at best as a peripheral consideration in relation to more pressing class conflicts,⁸¹ other class struggle libertarians however have been involved in ecological campaigns. Class War, for instance, although critical of the professional elitism and liberalism of established environmental groups, have supported actions such as the mass trespass to open up land to ramblers and [Class War No. 41, 8-9; No. 46, 10 & No. 47, 10]. Radical environmental groups have been, in recent years, the most sophisticated in adapting their organisational methods according to the repressive threat they are combating, the local context and the appropriate tactic. In areas where there is a large local presence directly under threat, such as in the anti-roads campaign in Pollock, residents have taken prominent roles in the campaign. Thousands went on marches, hundreds were involved in tearing down construction site fences and pupils at a local comprehensive demanded the right for time off school to protest the road development [Counter Information No. 42, 4]. Elsewhere campaigns have been based almost entirely on environmental camps because there is no large local community such as at the Nine Ladies protection site in Derbyshire (1999-2000). On other sites there has been conflict between the inhabitants on the sites and local residents.

The relationship between environmental protestors and locals is an instance of the general problem between self-identified 'radicals' and those with other identities. Often the problem manifests itself in an elitist division between the 'specialist' campaigners whose interests dominate over local residents. The creation of a vanguard group whose tactics dominate and who identify themselves as having superior knowledge and consequently tactical priority over other subjugated individuals has been a phenomena noted by radical environmentalists themselves. These differences are often exacerbated by the distinctive dress of the fully committed activist and the threatened neighbourhoods. At Newbury, site-based activists (as opposed to those resident in local communities) claimed a tribal identity, 'Donga'. What started as a way for a loose coalition of people to unify under the name of a tribe that resisted Roman rule, became reified. It became a badge of commitment, placing those in a position to organise their whole lives around the campaign over local activists and those with other responsibilities [Wall, 2000, 69-71 & Do or Die, No. 8, 155].

Even veterans of environmental camps recognise that the state and media responses have assisted in spectacularising radical protests. The most dedicated, 'long-haired' individuals and those who perform the most televisual stunts gain the most coverage and kudos. An informal hierarchy inside the group is created which reflects that between the camp members and those subjugated groups outside the tribe [Do or Die, No. 8, 157]. Yet not all such 'tribal' identities are fixed and divisive, nor do those who are capable of dedicating themselves to one campaign necessarily regard their position as primary or elite in which irregular attenders play only a supporting role. Neither is the solution to prioritise the desires of local residents, nor expect solidarity. A member of South Downs EF! in an article reprinted in Aufheben,⁸² points out that in the case of the M3 redevelopment, wealthy inhabitants around the area of the contentious Twyford Downs project had interests which were diametrically opposed to those of the protestors. Many of Winchester's citizens had no direct contact with the land and supported the extension of the car economy. The roads programme would enhance their access to rural pleasures as the new throughways would speed up the journey to Heathrow Airport and their Provencal retreats [Aufheben, No. 1, 2-4].

Dedicated environmental activists are not necessarily divorced from class struggle or come from privileged sections. The types of coalition developed will depend on the types of shared concerns, outlooks, dreams, fears and aspirations. As the Liverpool dockers coalition demonstrates, links of solidarity can be found between environmental and workplace groups with apparently different projects, yet common interests and inspiring co-operative alliances are forged. Douglass explains that the alternative social arrangements created by travellers and committed environmentalists which prefigure libertarianism are attractive to many individuals left unemployed by industrial decline. Communities of resistance offer a more positive alternative than grimly surviving redundancy in decaying mining communities [Douglass, 1992, 19-20].

5.3. Internet Co-ordination - the Global Community

Much has been written concerning the expansion of global communications.⁸³ The Internet⁸⁴ appears to

and Hugh J. Martin (2000) 'Hacktivism: the new protest movement' at www.spark-online.com/april00/printhappy7.0/martin.htm. There is also a discussion groups dedicated to hacktivism these include <http://hacktivism.tao.ca/> as well as guides assisting a myriad of computer based, subversive activities on <http://www.mc2.nu/> embody many of the key features associated with anarchism, namely internationalism, accessibility and decentralisation. The World Wide Web provides an additional medium for communication. The Poll Tax was probably the last major campaign to be largely absent on the Internet. Nearly every event with an anarchist following is advertised on at least one web page. All the major class struggle groups in Britain run a website (see Appendix Two) on which the association's meetings and actions are advertised.

The Internet also permits dialogue through email newsgroups, chat-rooms and guestbooks, in a way that normal printed propaganda finds difficult. Participatory forms of communication are more congruent with the prefigurative ideal than the monologue of much printed propaganda (see Chapter Five). The freedom of expression offered by Internet technology, and taken up by contemporary libertarians, has fed mainstream newspaper fears concerning the organisation of anarchist activities especially J18 [Direct Action, No. 3, 21 & Do or Die, No. 8, 5].⁸⁵ The cross continental nature of J18 co-ordination, replicated in the protests against the World Trade Organisation, International Monetary Fund and World Bank variously N30 in Seattle, USA (November 30th 1999), A16 in Washington USA (April 16, 2000), Mayday 2000 in London or Prague's S26 (September 26, 2000), helped to encourage these fantasies of secretive Internet-conspiracies. Many subjugated groups who are actively resisting are in a minority, and anarchists, especially those in geographically isolated regions, find that electronic communications can increase bonds of solidarity. A global action like J18 allowed small groups in places as diverse as Belarus, Uruguay and Pakistan to participate in a coordinated event [Black Flag, No. 218, 5-6]. The Zapatistas realised, computer-based information distribution provides gateways of solidarity with similarly subjugated groups in geographically diverse areas. As Time magazine acutely relates:

⁸⁴ For the sake of simplicity the Internet and World Wide Web are taken as the same thing same.

⁸⁵ The mainstream press warns that J18 were planned and directed by electronic media, and that modern technology provides new opportunities for creating disruption [Daily Telegraph, 19.7.99, 1; Financial Times, 18.7.99, 13]. The same claims were made concerning N30: '[A]narchists are urging supporters to "reclaim" the railways and underground. Militants are using the internet and e-mail to organise their campaign' [Daily Mirror, 29.11.99, 27].

[T]he Web was supposed to be globalism's great tool, not a forum for its enemies. The Web was supposed to weld together markets into one enormous worldwide trading floor, not organize thousands into picket lines [Time, April 2000, 3].

For Cleaver it is the Internet's ability to create links of solidarity across national frontiers without subsuming one organisation or campaign into another that is one of the key liberatory characteristics. The Internet does not just support existing organisations, but also creates new structures and tactics [Cleaver, 1998]. These organisations may just operate in the sphere of electronic civil disobedience using tactics specific to this arena (hacktivism). Hacktivists can be legal, electronically linked individuals, who may never meet directly, but co-ordinate in running independent web-based radios and news periodicals to counteract established channels of propaganda. Hacktivity can be more immediately transgressive, for instance entering and subverting government and corporate websites by swapping their texts for oppositional propaganda or swamping email addresses (spamming) so that the ebusiness can no longer operate [Wray, 1998]. The computer activism can also create new structures.

The Zapatista movement in the Chiapas region provides an example. The indigenous Indian population created their own autonomous structures outside of the repressive partially authoritarian state and sought support that went well beyond the borders of Mexico. Linking up through computer communication networks with other radical movements opposed to globalised neo-liberalism, the Zapatistas were influential in creating international networks concerned with human rights, indigenous struggle, labour organisation and women's rights. By being connected electronically groups could respond rapidly to counter governmental manoeuvres. The flow of communication was so great that the Zapatista National Liberation Army (EZLN) proposed an international gathering to compare notes on successes and failures. Radicals who had originally met through the Internet gathered in the Chiapas in the summer of 1996. This international gathering (or Encounter) was repeated in Spain in 1998 [Clever, 1998].

Advocates, such as Hugh Martin, suggest that hacktivism provides a means for international co-operation and involvement in (anti-)political activity.

Electronic protesting these days is a simple matter of downloading easy-to-use software from the Web, or of visiting a protest site where you can set up your browser to bombard a target site with requests for information. Anyone can be a hacktivist.

The global G8 protests of 1998 and 1999 and the WTO protests of last year were successfully organised by email and mobile phone--creative (but not illegal) use of information technology by protest groups has confounded law enforcement worldwide [Martin, 2000].

Yet it is easy to overstress the importance of the Internet and to ignore problems with hacktivism. The flow of information from newsgroups and e-lists can make it difficult to track down significant information, although some newsgroups offer an edited version. Second as Cleaver describes:

We bring to cyberspace our habits acquired in other spaces and many of those have been counterproductive and continue to be so in the new terrain. Personality conflicts, arrogance, sexism and racism and all other behaviour patterns that have tortured or destroyed other kinds of political efforts have been reproduced on the "Net". Few are the activists who have not abandoned a discussion or unsubscribed from a list or avoided returning to a newsgroup because of flame-wars [abusive emails], unbridled antagonisms or endless dialogues of the deaf...

Anyone with activist experience in cyberspace is familiar with the frustrations of being confronted not only with detailed reports but also with urgent pleas for action on the part of those struggles and situations that we know little or nothing about and feel incapable of evaluating [Cleaver, 1998].

Generally accepted rules for dignified behaviour that adapt according to site ('netiquette') are often developed to prevent the worst excesses of anti-social behaviour, and it demonstrates the ability for groups to govern themselves, but Cleaver's point still stands 'Cyberspace is no privileged arena' in terms of creating purer organisation [Cleaver, 1998].

Nor is Martin's contention raised on the page earlier that 'anyone can be a hacktivist' unproblematic. The spread of computer networks in the Americas is not matched by similar developments in Africa where 'vast areas not only lack any kind of Internet backbone, but even telephone lines' [Cleaver, 1998]. Nor is Martin's other contention that the major anti-globalist actions organised primarily on the Internet. While J18, N30 A16, Mayday 2000 and S26 did have a presence on the Net, and email lists did create links of solidarity prior to the event, other forms of communication were also of importance. Whilst Time too concentrates on the more spectacular use of the Internet in its report on the N30 protests, it does note it was not primarily co-ordinated by email and website. Standard methods of organisation were fundamental to its success. So too J18 was planned in public planning, traditional forms of communication such as leaflets, stickers and posters were plastered throughout London and beyond [Time, April 24, 2000, 40-1; Do or Die, No. 8. 5-6]. Dependence on computerised communications would be incompatible with the anarchist ideal because, as anarchists are aware, access is available only to 'a small fraction of people in the West outside of government, academia and business, and a much tinier fraction in the developing world' [Rosem, 1997, 114-5]. Nevertheless the Internet does provide additional possibilities for international solidarity, creating its own flexible cyber-organisations as well as influencing those not wholly dependant on the microchip and modem.

5.4. Community and Workplace Organisation

The division between community and workplace has been superseded. The traditional syndicalist view that universal priority is the site of immediate production such that community organisation takes only a supporting role, is rarely advanced by contemporary British anarchists. For many oppressed people it would be impossible, and indeed irrelevant, to distinguish between oppression experienced through employment and oppression in the wider social factory. Although in some contexts the oppressive practice is directly related to managerial control of labour, but not all sites of heteronomous administration are based at the point of production or exchange. Some subjugating practices take place across many different contexts. In some areas of employment the forms of oppression experienced might be more comparable to those in an area of the community than to another workplaces. Organisational responses would as a result share greater similarities.

Community based struggles often have shared interests with labour conflicts, and often the two are intimately interweaved. In combating the Poll Tax APTUs combined with workplace activity. In Derby, for example, the unions assisted poll tax rebels financially without trying to influence the decisions of the independent APTUs [Whitehead, 1996, 17-8]. Unions recognised that they and community based groups had common interests, with neither having universal priority over the other.⁸⁶

Local community groupings are often linked to workplace groups. Nottingham Association of Subversive Activists (NASA), a variant of the Bristol Rebel Alliance includes the Anarchist Trade Union Network and SolFed.⁸⁷ In these bodies links of solidarity are formed between environmental, community and workplace groups. Different tactics may be specific to certain localities, such as strikes in a factory or deliberate undercharging by sales assistants, and these methods might not be immediately available to those active on other terrain. Similarly community groups can employ tactics not available to those under the managerial gaze, however through co-operative collaboration new tactics are developed. Transposing methods and adapting them to other settings provides for new forms of solidarity and techniques for self-emancipation. Workplace and community groups are increasingly working together with neither demanding strategic hegemony.

⁸⁶ The same is true of the N30 anti-WTO protests: 'Marches and rallies were held throughout the day by an estimated 25,000 people representing groups from environmentalists to labour' [Financial Times, 1.12.99, 12], and in Britain the '[p]olice are investigating a link between the demonstrations in London and the underground "rave" dance culture' [The Times, 1.12.99, 11].

Summation

The disagreement between anarchist communism and syndicalism is overcome as neither now assumes that either community- nor workplace-based organisations are exclusively appropriate for libertarian politics, and as such are consistent with the anarchist ideal. Industrial organisation and community-based groups are pragmatic responses to specific oppressive practices. No form of organisation is applicable irrespective of context, just as no category of people is the appropriate agent of social change under all circumstances. Anarchist organisation is not necessarily spontaneous. Non-planning maybe consistent with certain forms of libertarian action, but formal structures, even outside of revolutionary situations, can still be consistent with the prefigurative ideal. In their ideal form the subjugated groups themselves form anarchist structures and combat their oppression through methods which prefigure libertarian principles.

Anarchist organisational principles do not prioritise one particular form, but do rule out certain representative and hierarchical modes of operation, such as the invisible dictatorship and the vanguard party. Modes of organisation should be synecdochic of the social relations that anarchists wish to achieve. Like desirable mutually beneficial relationship they cannot be predicted before hand. Just as friendships cannot be imposed, and just as it is impossible to predict how deep or how long a love affair will last, so too no one can externally will the forms of solidarity between subjugated groups. In the same way that relationships can become romances, life-long partnerships or develop into transitory but intense liaisons, so too groups and collaborations can be continuous, occasional or temporary depending on context and subjects.

Multiform types of oppression, which are not necessarily, economic alone, require and create heterogeneous responses, as Jean Grave suggested well before the First World War:

Society teems with abuses; against each abuse, there must rise up that group of those who suffer most from it in order to combat it.... Not only groups struggling against that which exists, but attempts to group together along the lines of the future, with a view to producing faith, well-being, solidarity, among like-minded individuals [Q. Grave in Miller, 1984, 131]

Multiple organisational tactics confront the diversity of oppressive practices and seek to develop solidarity along autonomous, locally decided lines. Frequent, diverse, local acts of resistance that combine with other micro-oppositional forces can create a critical mass which initiates change. Particular types of structure are associated with certain types of tactic. The interrelation of structure and tactic and appropriateness of various forms of resistance and confrontation are examined in the next chapter.

Chapter Five
Anarchist Tactics

Chapter Five

Anarchist Tactics

Introduction

Ideal types of contemporary anarchism reject the strategic and unitary responses of Leninism and instead propose varied and polymorphous tactics. Chapter IV examined the multiple prefigurative organisational methods approved by the anarchist ideal, in which subjugated agents practice reciprocal social relations which are synecdochic of the characteristics of a liberated society. The variety of organisational arrangements inspires a multiplicity of tactics that prefigure anarchist objectives. These practical methods, as discussed in Chapter II, are often classified as 'direct action'. They make sense in relation to prefiguration through an examination of the identities of the oppressed subjects who use them, contextual characteristics such as the links (and limits) of support as well as the aims they prefigure.

There are libertarians who favour one particular method, or programme, as having strategic centrality. Nonetheless, whilst these Leninist forms of anarchism are not ignored, the ideal type anarchist response that is tactical and multiform is also shown to be a significant and effective constituent in contemporary libertarian movements. A strategic politic is based on a hypothetical imperative. It sees one central struggle with one fundamental aim, which is regarded as the revolution, a temporally distinct and identifiable event. All actions are assessed, in the final analysis, in terms of whether they foment this revolution. Consequentialist approaches, with a clear separation of means justified through recourse to the benevolence of the eventual ends, are rejected by the prefigurative analysis of class struggle anarchism.

The rejection of instrumentalist approaches does not mean that anarchists are non-revolutionary, although their conception of 'revolution' differs significantly from that of their opponents within socialist traditions. All the major class struggle anarchist groups repeatedly stress that social and economic relations require fundamental alteration, and that this radical transformation is achieved only through non-constitutional methods. Whilst the Leninist model sees the revolution as an event which validates all the acts leading up to it, contemporary tactical anarchists view the revolution less as a unified moment, more as a continuous and developing process of situations and enchanting moments of liberation.

The first section of the chapter discusses the specific nature of the anarchist ideal of revolution as a non-unique event. Revolution is not a single phenomenon but the accumulation of ever expanding and growing incidents of prefigurative anarchist actions. 'Rebellion' and 'insurrection' refer to less frequent, more geographically contained, incidents of libertarian resistance. In a later section, localised forms of rebellion, such as sabotage and criminality, are identified and assessed in terms of their prefigurative characteristics.

The forms of direct action considered in this chapter are divided contingently into industrial and community actions. Workplace methods including the mass strike and sabotage have been seen as archetypal of anarchism. In the community category methods such as squatting and theft also have a long association with anarchism. Other methods such as constitutional activity are often regarded as antithetical to libertarianism, yet have been used by class struggle anarchists. Alternative techniques, derived from post-structuralism, such as hyper-passivity and disengagement, variants of that can be compatible with anarchism, are also critically assessed with regard to prefiguration.

1. Revolution

Despite the universal acceptance of the need for revolution in contemporary class struggle anarchist writings,¹ there is a lack of clarity concerning the constituents and characteristics of a revolution. So while the term is widely evoked, it is rarely defined or explained.² 'Revolution' indeed has contradictory meanings, invoking both drastic change, and the notion of a full cyclic sequence returning back to an original position.³

² Class War, by no means the worse offender, in their two substantial works A Decade of Disorder and Unfinished Business include just two pages (out of nearly 300) on what makes, creates and distinguishes a revolution [Class War, 1992, 109-110].

Anarchists consider that increasing liberty is the aim of revolution and that altering political practice is insufficient to achieve this end. Other oppressive forces such as the economic modes of production and exchange need to be confronted and overcome. Marx & Engels' definition of revolution as 'the most radical rupture with traditional property relations' [Marx & Engels, 1977, 58], is approved by class struggle anarchists. As Ray Cunningham of the WSM explains: 'We are not interested in exchanging one set of rulers for another; when we speak of revolution we do not mean a coup d'etat. Anarchist revolution is a fundamental change in the way society is ordered' [Cunningham, 1995, 13]. Anarchists conforming to the ideal type reject the political revolution but in doing so are not merely suggesting its replacement by an economic one. The paradigm of prefigurative libertarianism recognises that the ambition of social revolution requires a transformation of the whole nexus of intertwined practices.

In rejecting political revolution anarchists are in agreement with Hannah Arendt who, in order to demonstrate its inadequacy, repeats Plato's definition of revolution as the 'quasi-natural transformation from one form of government to another' [Arendt, 1979, 21].⁴ The cosmological character of revolution still has residues in the modern era, but it is not the supernatural feature of Plato's definition that is criticised but the fact that it is too wide. Changes in government need not require wider social or economic changes [Arendt, 1979, 47-8]. For anarchists, as well as

Arendt, these latter oppressive powers have to be challenged in order for a process to be truly 'revolutionary'.

Confusion arises as sometimes only libertarian forms of social change that is in agreement with anarchist principles are described as 'revolution'. On other occasions those uprisings which change social relations but reintroduce hierarchy are still recognised by anarchists as revolutions although as undesirable ones. On occasions the demarcation between one conception of revolution and the other is ignored, so a critic may appear to be discussing one type of uprising while it is being interpreted as another. Even those revolts that do not have libertarian aims are discussed in terms of their revolutionary potential, irrespective of the eventual result and intentions of its main actors. For instance, John Casey of Class War makes a distinction between the mutiny against the Shah of Iran, which is designated a 'revolution' and the theocracy that followed which is regarded as counterrevolution [Casey, 1990, 30]. Similarly anarchists from an earlier era supported the October Revolution which they considered to be distinct from the Bolshevik take-over.⁵ Meltzer, in the context of most important historic event since the Great French Revolution [...] the most significant fact in the whole known history of mankind. It is the only Revolution which aimed de facto, at social world-revolution; it is the only one which actually abolished the capitalism system on a country' [Berkman, 1986, 14].

He later appraised that the Bolsheviks imposed a bureaucratic counterrevolution which would require a third revolution to overthrow [Berkman, 1986, 26 & 91].

the Bolshevik Revolution, suggests that such a distinction between means and eventual ends is not feasible, as it is not possible 'to defend the gain of the Russian Revolution while not accepting Lenin's triumph' [Meltzer, 1976a, 40].⁶ Casey and Meltzer have different interpretations of 'revolution'. For Casey, it refers to the series of events that culminates in the overthrowing the leadership. For Meltzer it is a more elongated process extending beyond into the creation of new social relations after the expulsion of the original hierarchy.

1.1. Anarchist Ideal of Revolution

The anarchist conception of revolution, in its ideal form, requires multiple successful confrontations of oppressive powers, rather than a single determining conflict. Revolution needs agents of change who are conscious of their role in wishing to create more egalitarian social relations. Struggle takes place across a variety of terrains and is carried out by the oppressed subjects themselves, who through their self-organisation prefigure forms of libertarian social relations. Acts of resistance and the types of alliances created are sometimes temporary, but always strive to be non-hierarchical. In different locations revolutionary action will take different forms and involve distinct tactics, with no single method being regarded as either universal or sufficient. As such, revolutions are both means and ends. They are an on-going processes of generating non-hierarchical adventure.

⁶ See too Cunningham's comment that 'The first thing to consider is the kind of revolution that we are fighting for, because the ends we have in mind, will, to a large extent determine the means we use' [Cunningham, 1995, 13].

For libertarian marxists, as discussed in Chapter Three, the acts of the agents of change are the pivotal determinants in changing social relations. The anarchist concept of change differs from Leninist orthodoxy that sees revolution as being economically determined.⁷ The modes of production determine the structure of social relations. As capitalism develops the classes, which are produced by the developing forces of production, grow in antagonism. The increasing alienation of the oppressed class, the proletariat, raises their consciousness of their subjugation and raises their desire for revolution [Cohan, 1975, 56-67]. The determinist account is rejected by libertarian marxists, who recognise that the various factors in the political-economic description are not mechanically related in a relationship of cause and effect but are mutually interdependent [Cleaver, 1979, 34]. Revolutionary class(es) create their own social structures, some separate to, others in conflict with, existing heteronomous forces. These relationships provoke change of economic conditions as well as being produced by them.

Revolutions, according to the anarchist ideal, are not unique acts, being indistinguishable, except in scale, from more localised anarchist tactics from which revolution materialises. The ideal avoids the problems associated with the Leninist model. Orthodox marxists regard 'revolution' as having a temporally specific location, differing in its social relations to the movements which create it and the emancipated society that comes after. The uprising produces in its first instance a transitional society, which for Lenin, and Trotsky is identified as socialism, while the eventual goal remains communism. Anarchists recognised that this distinction between methods and aims lead to the transitional period becoming the objective rather than the means. Ironically, this is confirmed by Trotsky. He observes that it was the transitional period and the 'temporary' state apparatus, a bureaucracy he had helped to create, which assisted in the repression of Soviet citizens. The transitory administrative regime came to be identified with the Soviet Union and Communism themselves [Trotsky, 1983, 94].⁸

The anarchist model regards revolution as emerging from escalating, diversely located acts that interact and interweave. Such a paradigm is illustrated in novels like Breaking Free and The Free. The growth of intertwining libertarian actions, rather than one heroic, centrally organised assault, leads the existing order to crisis.⁹ Class War describe the prelude to the overthrow of heteronomous rule in similar multiple tactical terms. Communities come together to expel state, bourgeois or other oppressive instruments and create liberated spaces or 'no go areas' which are matched by similar acts in production where workers impose

⁸ Trotsky held that the bureaucratization of the transitional period can be attributed to the military threat to the Revolution and the dire economic circumstances which was caused by the civil war [Trotsky, 1983, 108-14]. Berkman, in his criticism of the Bolshevik regime, suggests that the response to invasion and famine need not have taken a bureaucratic turn and that the choice of this strategy was partly due to the ideology of Leninism [Berkman, 1989, 67; Berkman, 1986, 39-40].

their own desires onto distribution and creation [Class War, 1992, 109].

The size and frequency of these libertarian acts, rather than any millennial or 'quasi-natural' trait, characterises the ideal-type anarchist revolution. Wide-scale subversive tactics so disrupt the existing social and communicative order that existing categories of explanation and understanding dissolve and new forms of communication appear. The events of May 1968 were transmitted, often via graffiti, in quasi-poetic forms. Revolution, as the SI described in their 1960s free magazine, becomes a succession of miracles, rather than a unique, isolated wonder [Situationist International, 1989, 224]. Revolutions as singular events would be reintegrated into the already established symbolic order and hence become counterrevolutionary. The spontaneous, unending progressions of these wonders may avoid such recuperation. When revolution ceases it has failed.

1.2. Temporary Autonomous Zone

The preference for these immediate insurrectionary moments lead some anarchists, especially Americans such as Zerzan, Black and Bey to favour the Temporary Autonomous Zone (TAZ) as preferable to revolution. Yet, the concept of the TAZ, influenced by post-structuralism,¹⁰ is contrasted favourably to a very specific pre-modern version of revolution, interpreted as part of a cyclic return to heteronomous power [Bey, 1991, 99]. This is not an depiction of revolution shared by contemporary anarchists. The TAZ, although sharing many features with the libertarian ideal revolution, as many class struggle proponents recognise, has flaws that the latter avoids.¹¹ The similarities between the two are that the methods of their realisation are non-hierarchical, creative and stimulating [Bey, 1991, 105-6]. The TAZ does however differ from the revolution, in that it does not confront oppressive forces but hides or flees from them. 'The TAZ exists not only beyond Control but also beyond definition, beyond gazing and naming as acts of enslaving, beyond the understanding of the State, beyond the State's ability to see' [Bey, 1991, 132]. The TAZ does not aim to defeat or subvert the State but disbands, when confronted, and re-forms elsewhere. Like the Peace Convoys of the 1980s, the New Age travellers or the House music ravers, they melted away and reformed on another site.¹² The TAZ is always fleeting and fleeing.

Class struggle anarchists support acts of liberation that may be short-lived, such as riots, but do not hold that State power will exist forever. The TAZ is parasitic on oppressive power as it exists in the empty spaces that have escaped the gaze of the State and is distinct from the lived experience of the every day [Bey, 1991, 100-1]. Consequently, while such tactics of evasion might well be appropriate, especially where the alternative methods of conflict can only be symbolic due to the strength of opposition, prioritising the TAZ discriminates against those forms of resistance that can successfully confront oppressive force. The anarchist ideal of revolution allows for greater, wider and more flexible forms of opposition than the TAZ.

¹¹ Bey's concept of the TAZ was taken up by the Alder Valley Anarchists [see Green Anarchist No. 49-50, 16].

[T]he Autonomous Zone was the place where you were in control and they weren't! It might be Tristan Da Cunha in 1928, a barren rock off Ireland in the 60s or 300 yards of rioter controlled roadway in the stand-off with the cops [Bone, 1999, 6].

¹² Police and local dignitaries have sought out confrontation with local movements, such as the convoy at the Battle of the Beanfield in 1985 [see Hemment, 1998, 208-9, 217-8]. Judicial action did meet with active resistance, but more often, a party venue closed down by the authorities just re-opened in a different site under a new name.

Bey's partiality for nomadic methods privileges a vanguard. He diminishes the role of those economically constrained from itinerant drifting such as those involved in more mundane, but necessary, acts of rebellion [Bey, 1991, 101]. Bey, like Deleuze regards change as not simply reactive. Yet, like Deleuze, Bey's nomads are specific only to those practices and oppressed subject positions that are capable of drifting. This unspoken assumption leaves Bey open to the criticism that he ignores the specificities of various forms of oppression by reducing responses to a singular form of response [Braidotti, 1993, 49]. The nomad, at least as described by Deleuze, assumes an equivalence between genders that overlooks their different socio-historical constructs [Braidotti, 1993, 52]. The nomad is little different from the abstract, liberal moral agent of Freedom Press and Baldelli, as it is gender-, race- and class-blind.¹³ The anarchist revolution recognises that the subjects of change have many different identities and the methods will correspondingly take disparate forms. These methods can be confrontational as well as evasive, while it is their continuity and frequency that constitutes revolutionary change. The similarities between the anarchist ideal of revolution and the TAZ are clear. Camus, quoting Bakunin calls the revolution 'a feast without beginning and without end' [Camus, 1965, 127], the revolution is an amalgamation of prefigurative rebellious acts whose frequency and intensity creates a critical mass, that fundamentally alters a multitude of interdependent repressive practices and powers. Unlike the TAZ revolution is not dependent on the lacunae in state relations, but can create its own values that challenge dominant practices.

1.3. Rebellion

'Rebellion' has been interpreted in many, often incompatible, ways. For class struggle anarchists the term 'rebellion' is compatible with revolution, but indicates smaller scale interruptions of oppressive practices. Burns, for instance, titles his analysis of the campaigns against Thatcher's changes in local government finance, Poll Tax Rebellion. The book describes the confrontations with constitutional political institutions, judicial powers and penal disciplines. Burns ends with a description of how the multiplicities of defiant tactics lead to the successful eradication of an important, iniquitous piece of legislation. The multiple acts of resistance to the Community Charge led to the fall of the Prime Minister, but did not undermine these wider, grander, singular oppressive practices. Rebellion, nevertheless holds out the promise of extension into revolution.

Others, such as Woodcock, interpret 'rebellion' in terms of individual defiance and consequently as distinct from revolution. Quoting Camus, as supporting a Stirnerite evocation of the individual ego, Woodcock declares that rebellion is different to revolution as the latter demands the overthrow of the existing order while rebellion by contrast is individualist and egoistic [Woodcock, 1975, 96-7].¹⁴ Rebellion for Woodcock is identified with a strategic preference for individual liberty. Confusion in definitions is indicative of the different types of anarchism and their disparate aims. Woodcock's version is compatible with 'lifestyle anarchism' as it 'foster[s] ideas of individual autonomy rather than social freedom' [Bookchin, 1995, 9-10]. Class struggle anarchists such as the AWG, by no means approving of Bookchin's municipal anarchism, share his disdain for individualist rebellion that sought 'personal solutions to social problems' [Fox, 1989, 6]. They consequently reject Stirnerite rebellion as it ignores oppression and neglects to create social relations such as networks of solidarity.¹⁵ When class struggle anarchists promote rebellion they are not doing so in individualist term, as they do not consider such action to be appropriately prefigurative. The term 'rebellion' from hereon refers to the social version preferred by Burns and class struggle anarchists [Burns, 1992].

1.4. Insurrection and Riot

There are two interpretations of 'insurrection'; the first defines it as the armed period of a general revolution [Sparks, 1996, 8-9]; the second as a localised, often spontaneous, uprising. It is the latter definition that has long been associated with anarchism. Bakunin and his followers are often portrayed as 'insurrectionists'¹⁶ on the basis of their activities in Lyons in 1870 and Bologna in 1874. Bakunin's supporters are not the only class struggle libertarians to support regional uprisings.¹⁷ Insurrections, as regional uprisings, originally attempted to set up liberated zones and to encourage, by example, neighbouring areas to rise up. They are popularly identified with spontaneous, rather than organised movements, although Bakunin and others, did attempt to contrive them [Kedward, 1971, 56]. Orthodox marxists, in particular, have been critical of such tactics, on two grounds.

¹⁵ Fox looks at how tactics like the 1980s Stop the City demonstrations which made little attempt to broaden out beyond the 'anarchist ghetto' and the refusal, by some anarchist currents at the time, to assist workers struggles preferring 'isolation by the anarcho elite' [Fox, 1989, 7]. Thomas in his critique of Stirner's individualist rebellion criticises the ego's concern only for the self to be unrestrained without concern for others [Thomas, 1980, 141]. This begs the question of what forms of social relation the liberated Stirnerite self could form.

First insurrection was based on a non-specific revolutionary agent, 'the masses', rather than the proletariat [Thomas, 1980, 292]. This objection prioritises the proletariat as the only legitimate revolutionary agent and has been dealt with in Chapter III. The second criticism is that insurrection is too localised to oppose more general oppressions. These grander powers are thought to require a wider, more stable organisation [Sparks, 1996, 9], a view that seems to be supported by the abject failure in which Bakunin's insurrectionary attempts ended. For the anarchist ideal, however, insurrection can be acceptable and need not be restricted to Bakunin's domino theory of strategic revolution. Insurrections are permissible so long as the following conditions are met. Firstly the agents primarily involved in the uprising are the oppressed themselves. Secondly the social relations the riot promotes are consistent with anarchist ethics.¹⁸

Finally, the uprising must be seen as tactical rather than strategic, reaching out beyond the confines of specific localities and to promote, assist and be superseded by other forms of tactic. There is certainly a prefigurative feature to insurrection, which the historian Roderick Kedward admires, as it is a method that is consistent with principles of federated local control [Kedward, 1971, 56].

The consistent anarchist would not regard the local, physical uprising as sufficient either as means or end, but as a useful tactic. British class struggle libertarians maintain that a major change in economic conditions would require substantial acts of force, occurring across a range of localities. But the fact that anarchists, such as Class War, defended and encouraged rioting made them a suitable scapegoat for the urban unrest in 1985.¹⁹ Class War was delighted to be considered so influential, although they acknowledged that radical sections of working class communities themselves should take the credit. Class War was willing to be associated with the urban insurrectionists in the hope that the media interest would boost anarchism, which indeed it did. It should be noted, however, that their influence in the widespread disturbances that year was minimal [Home, 1988, 98-100]. It was not just the mainstream media that misunderstood Class War's support for insurrectionary uprisings. An article in Here and Now inaccurately portrayed British anarchists, and Class War in particular, as regarding riots as 'the highest expression of class warfare' [KH, 1986, 6]. If anarchists did assert a hierarchy of activities, then this would be inconsistent with the ideal, but libertarians, even in the early 1980s, proposed multiple responses. During the Miners' Strike of 1984-5, Class War proposed a programme of 'minor insurgency as the real anarchist contribution' to an effort to open up a 'second front' in non-colliery neighbourhoods so as to draw 'police out of the mining areas'. Such a tactic was proposed in support of, not to replace, other forms of revolt. Rioting would take advantage of and support industrial action, hit squad attacks on scabs and nearby police stations and conventional propaganda [Class War 'another fucking royal parasite' edition, 4 & 3].

Riots, a form of insurrection, have long marked the distinction between anarchists and Leninists. The incendiary wave of spontaneous riots which hit urban, suburban and rural areas alike in 1981 were dismissed by the Leninist groupings as a response to capitalist oppression but not a suitable method for resolution. For the orthodox revolutionary left the appropriate method was the proletariat seizing political power through the revolutionary party, not the urban poor acting for themselves [Smith, Speed et. al., 1982, 4, 21-2]. Leninist attitudes persist, for example, in their response to J18. The June 18th 'carnival against capitalism' metamorphosed from street festival and rave into a riot and back again. The co-ordination for the event was arranged by an amalgam of environmental, anti-Third World Debt and anarchist groups.²⁰ The action demonstrated the difference between the anarchist ideal and Leninism. The J18 campaign deliberately avoided central representation; no one even mediated with the police as there was no formal leadership who could represent the diversity of groups. Prior to the event, J18 was considered an irrelevancy by orthodox marxist groupings who took no role in the planning nor in the day itself. The SWP, at the time rejected the methods and J18 events as 'inadequate' for it lacked proper organisation [Socialist Worker, 26.7.99, 15]. The SWP also dismissed J18 as 'not enough to challenge the system', yet on this basis every action - including strikes or voting for the Labour Party, methods the SWP support, should be dismissed.²¹ The reason for rejecting the J18 as legitimate is because it was not carried out by the industrial working class at the point of production, where 'real power to change society lies' [Socialist Worker, 26 June, 15].²² The method of co-operative, decentralised co-ordination left mainstream journalists confused, as without a spokesperson or leader, with no single locus of confrontation, the event fell outside of their experience and interpretative abilities.²³

Anarchists do not believe that singular localised insurrections will completely alter power relations,

but that they can assist in the process and strengthen oppressed subject groups [Organise! No. 27, 4 & Raf, 1986, 2]. They can provide instant moments of solidarity, breaking down divisions between and within oppressed groups.²⁴ Urban uprisings also provide opportunities to demonstrate different forms of distribution, where the restraints of commercial norms and commodification no longer apply. As Plant describes, when the 'spell of the shop window is broken' commodities are shorn of their false properties and can be seen anew. Riots provide opportunities for the oppressed, who have to create fresh forms of exchange themselves as there is 'no possibility of distinguishing between the "good" values of the revolutionary consciousness and the "bad" ones of spectacular reification in advance' [Plant, 1992, 31].

With the breaking down of the rule of capital new subjectivities emerge which take many forms. Pillaged household goods piled up and burnt are turned into bizarre avant-garde sculptures [Dangerous Times, 1986, 6]. Social services are recreated with deliveries of milk made to every house from a looted milk float [Bone, Pullen & Scargill, 1991, 60]. Co-operative plunder creates new social relations away from state observation and other quasi-state hierarchies [Dangerous Times, 1986, 6 & 8].²⁵ British anarchist descriptions of the

²⁵ Riots rather than being race riots - as the mainstream media have often portrayed them, are often meeting places of communal activity by black and

Trafalgar Square riot of 1990 during the anti-Poll Tax campaign also report the creation of imaginative social relations.²⁶ The uprising had many consequences that could not have been predicted before hand. It confronted the conspicuous consumption of London's West End and terrorised the government into reversing its local taxation initiative [Plant, 1992, 31 & Wall, 2000, 115] (fig. 5.1.). The large-scale unrest also played a significant role in removing the apparently impregnable Conservative leader, something that the SWP originally believed rioting could not achieve [Trotwatch, 1992, 29-30].

The brawling affray in central London in 1990 cannot be divorced from the range of campaigns, confrontations and organisations that came before and followed it, including work-based activity. Gilroy's observations of the 1981 riots confirm that community uprising and industrial activity are interrelated. The aftermath of the 1981 revolts influenced the structures and composition of trade unions and subsequently the Health Service strike the following year [Gilroy, 1991, 33]. Yet riots are not prioritised over other forms of libertarian struggle.

Rebellions take many forms; they can be a TAZs, liberatory moments in themselves. They are prefigurative processes in which creative forms of libertarian social organisation can be realised. Unlike Bey's TAZ however, rebellions seek out areas of confrontation and encourage other forms of contestation. As these events grow in frequency the social formations that form these dissident acts dissolve heteronomous power. Revolution constitutes the greatest frequency and impact of acts of rebellion, insurrection and riot (see figure 4.1). Challenging oppressive economic conditions and practices, which divide production and consumption, pleasure, play and labour is not sufficient. Prefigurative liberatory action confronts all forms of heteronomous control.

2. Industrial Activity

As discussed in the previous chapter, many contemporary anarchists do not make a critical

strategic distinction between community and workplace activity. They follow the autonomist marxist argument that capitalism operates in all aspects of social life seeking out surplus labour, not just at the point of production. Nevertheless there are tactics that are customarily described as specific to the point of production, the most prominent and disruptive being the general social or mass strike. While this chapter segregates workplace and community actions, it does not endorse the division but simply reflects their frequent differentiation. Many of the tactics described in one form can be used in the other arena. Such features of contemporary employment as home-working, commuting and in-service training further undermine the legitimacy of the division that encompass environments beyond the immediate location of production. Forms of oppression in a particular office may have more in common with demeaning practices in a household than with another, apparently similar occupation.

As was seen in Chapter III some contemporary activists, such as Meltzer, wrongly place a strategic emphasis on the workplace:

It is not because we think that 'the industrial proletariat can do no wrong' that we advocate action by the industrial proletariat; it is simply because they have the effective means to destroy the old economy and build a new one, in our type of society at least. The Free Society [...] will come about through workers' councils taking over the place of work [Meltzer, 1986, 18].

Meltzer in 1986 gives pre-eminence given to the industrial based on a version of economic determinism in which altering modes and relations of productivity directly cause radical change in social relations. Destroying the economic base is akin to building the new society. Meltzer's reductive account rules out the possibility of oppressive powers that may not be wholly determined by economic forces. Rejecting strategic centrality for industrial methods does not imply a repudiation of these tactics, only that they are not exclusive or sufficient.

Historically the tactic most associated with anarchism is one classified as an industrial method, namely the mass strike, but whilst it is an important form of direct action, it is not the only one. The most appropriate forms of anarchist action (ideal ones) are compatible with variants of sabotage. Sabotage is a category of anti-political activity that includes more than just machine-breaking, which is how it is normally understood by orthodox marxists. Before examining how the concept of 'sabotage' embraces the key features of direct action it is first important to consider the mass strike, in order to appraise its prefigurative strengths and weaknesses.

2.1. The Mass Strike

In 1832 William Benbow promoted the idea of a grand national holiday, in the form of a mass strike [Carter, 1973, 38].²⁷ This form of direct action would wrest control of the manufacturing apparatuses from the owners for the productive classes. Practical efforts at its realisation impelled the tailors of Derby during the Silk Mill Lock Out and the formation of the Grand National Consolidated Trades Union (GNCTU) as the organisational structure to support this proto-syndicalist strategy.²⁸

²⁷ Woodcock gives the date as 1833 [Woodcock, 1975, 299].

As was seen in the previous chapter, revolutionary syndicalists such as the American, pre-First World War IWW had a clear strategy. The revolution would be made by building one big union that would coordinate the general social strike [Dubofsky, 1990, 208]. The weaknesses of 'One Big Union' was recognised by Malatesta who argued that one structure could not represent all interests [Malatesta, 1984, 115].²⁹ The strategic centrality of early forms of anarcho-syndicalism continues in the pivotal role given to the mass strike as the pivotal tactic in creating revolution. 'The social general strike is the weapon with which the working class will make the social revolution' [DAM, 1984, 8], as it 'gives the most comprehensive expression to their strength as a social factor' [Rocker, 1990e, 68]. Contemporary anarchists, including anarcho-syndicalists, do not have such a strategic view of the mass strike but regard it as one tactic amongst others, which can assist in contesting oppressive practices.

The general strike was considered to be so effective on its own that it was even approved of by more pacific anarchists [Woodcock, 1975, 19]. Johann Most contests the understanding of the general strike as sufficient and nonviolent. For Most the general strike is the millennial method which would destroy the old order but would not be a peaceful method because 'the strike-breakers will loot, burn dynamite, and assassinate. Beginning in anticipation of social revolution, the general strike thus becomes social revolution itself' [Trautmann, 1980, 193-4]. Although Most, like many other syndicalists recognised that the mass strike would require other tactics, he still considered the workers involved in the industrial dispute to be the central agents and that the general stoppage held principal importance.

The mass strike is closely associated with anarchism because it is an example of libertarian direct action. The eradication of managerial control of industry through the refusal to work and its subsequent appropriation by the agents who had formerly been under its control was the basis of anarcho-syndicalism. 'The great importance of the general strike lies in this: At one blow it brings the whole economic system to a standstill and shakes it to its foundations' [Rocker, 1990e, 69]. So associated is the tactic of the general strike with anarchism³⁰ that revolutionaries from other socialist traditions, such as Rosa Luxemburg, had to distance themselves from anarchism, by denouncing it, in order to advocate this method.³¹

Post-structural anarchism would be in agreement with Luxemburg as she does not regard the mass strike to be a method solely applicable to the organised worker. '[T]he class instinct of the youngest, least trained, badly educated and still worse organised Russia proletariat is immeasurably stronger than that of the organised, trained and enlightened working class of any other Western European country' [Luxemburg, 1986, 68]. Luxemburg's observation conflicts with Lenin who considered that the mass strike required such organisational preconditions that it presupposed the political ascendancy of the working class, and was hence unnecessary [Harding, 1996, 68]. Luxemburg's conception of industrial methods recognised that the political strikes, those favoured by Lenin, arranged and controlled by parties, tend to be rare, small and limited in scope and at best can only play a minor role in preparing workers or initial sparks for great conflagrations [Luxemburg, 1986, 48 & 53-4]. The mass strike was libertarian in form because it cannot be commanded as it is too large and multifaceted to be under political control. It is 'the indication, the rallying idea, of a whole period of the class struggle lasting for years' which no structure is capable of dictating [Luxemburg, 1986, 47].

Luxemburg and the anarchist ideal do however differ. For Luxemburg the economic battle is, in the final analysis, central and strategic. Luxemburg reduces revolutionary activity to the role of a single, vanguard agency, the proletariat, albeit one unmediated by a Leninist organisation [Luxemburg, 1986, 72]. Contemporary anarcho-syndicalists, breaking with the strategic centralism of their predecessors, argue that a multi-tactical disposition is required:

Anarcho-syndicalism involves recognising the essential need to remove all forms of hierarchical power relationship in order to create a better society. The call for the Social General Strike/Social Revolution has to be more than a call for the end of capitalism. It cannot be limited to workers opting out of capitalist control; either because other oppressive control is not recognised, or because 'the end of capitalism means the end to all oppression'. Neither should it be the overthrowing of capitalism and then it is time to get on with all these other problems. Those 'other problems' need to be addressed (along with economic control) both now, at the time of the social revolution, and no doubt afterwards as well [Direct Action, No. 3, Summer 1997, 4].

The general strike would involve not just conflict within the economic arena but also in other areas. These battles require the engagement of actors far wider than the subsection 'industrial worker', as the strike leads to conflict in communities [Rocker, 1990e, 69]. The types of oppression countered would not only be those reduced to the economic, but would extend into other practices.

2.2. Sabotage

The term 'sabotage' has its roots in the industrial sector and either refers to the clumsiness of the step when wearing a wooden clog (sabot) [Carter, 1973, 6] or to using the hard footwear to destroy machinery. Engels speaks of sabotage only in terms of machine-breaking and associates sabotage with the pre-industrial Luddites. He considers Luddism as a form of protest that is easily crushed and should be replaced with a more appropriate organisational method [Engels, 1958, 243]. As such Engels places sabotage very low down a hierarchy of proletarian action, just above criminality.³² Such a view of sabotage is shared by some anarchists,³³ but is wrong on three grounds. Sabotage is not necessarily unplanned, although it may be more covert than other forms of action. Second, while the oppressed subject carries it out, such activities involve self-creating autonomous power as well as confronting oppressive practices. Finally, sabotage is not only limited to machine breaking.

The orthodox marxist parties and social democratic trade unions have historically been suspicious, and often downright contemptuous of machine-breaking. The industrial sociologist Pierre Dubois, writing in the aftermath of the Paris uprisings of 1968, relates how the different trade union organisations in France can be distinguished according to their stance on sabotage which reflects their ideologies. The professedly 'marxist' post-1914 Confederation Generale du Travail (CGT) opposes sabotage, while the Confederation Francaise Democratique du Travail (CFDT) takes a less strict line. Anarchists, who dominated the pre-1914 CGT, approve of sabotage as do 'Maoists', according to Dubois, [Dubois, 1979, 97].³⁴ The 'marxist' position, suggests Dubois, can be traced back to Engels.

The low status Engels awards sabotage is partly due to his definition of the term, regarding it as simply machine or product breaking. This is too narrow. It will be interpreted here as 'the conscious attempt to reduce the profitability of the organisation through the subversion of managerial authority'. As such it shares similarities with Toni

Negri's 'refusal of work' which is 'one and the same time deconstruction of capital and self-valorisation of the class' [Negri, 1979, 126]. It is the means to obstruct the practices that have evolved to extract surplus value. Instead, the oppressed agents create modes of being which are not determined by the dictates of profit. As such sabotage is akin to anarchist direct action, a multifaceted form of prefigurative behaviour performed by subject groups themselves. As such 'sabotage', like 'direct action', usefully encapsulate the anarchist revolutionary ambition.

2.3. Machine and Product Breaking

Accounts of sabotage such as those at Lordstown car plant, described by Lamb in his introduction to Flynn's treatise, uncover an array of sophisticated structures and communication between workers. Even less overt forms of sabotage rely on the networks of workplace friendships, the sophisticated signs of a nod and the wink, rather than the formal administrative structures of official labour organisation [Lamb, 1995, 3]. Machine-breaking and product-destruction is not often amenable to central administrative control. The oppressed agents themselves are better located than a revolutionary leadership in recognising how a loose screw, or a mis-hit computer key can cause maximum inconvenience for their employers. As such sabotage is much more acceptable to anarchists than strategic politicians. Sabotage is no more an act of powerlessness than striking (an activity that is higher up Engels' hierarchy). It is through acts of machine manipulation that workers can hit immediately at their bosses, create networks of support and can, as part of a wider industrial campaign, gain reforms when other tactics have not succeeded. The Copenhagen print-workers who sabotaged the newspaper they produced, forced the owners into making concessions [Flynn, 1995, 25].

Dubois correctly recognises that sabotage can take many more forms including arson, theft, vandalism, strikes, go slows and absenteeism [Dubois, 1979, 21]. Nonetheless he still defines it inadequately: 'that done by workers, individually or collectively, to the manufactured product or the machinery of production, that results in lowering the quantity or quality of production, whether temporarily or permanently' [Dubois, 1979, 14]. The problems with this definition are twofold. The less important is that it seems to exclude those service sectors that might not have a tangible product or machinery. Flynn gives an example of waiters who inform customers of the poor kitchen hygiene thereby dissuading patrons from remaining and as a result reducing the restaurant's profits [Flynn, 1995, 18]. The more important problem with Dubois' definition is that some sabotage can increase the quality of the product at the expense of the owners. In silk manufacture where the product was adulterated with tin and lead to increase the weight of the product or milk distributors who diluted their product with water, Flynn recommends that the impurities could be excluded to increase quality and also cut the factory owner's profit [Flynn, 1995, 16-7]. The 'good work strike', as McFarlane argues in Here and Now, is prefigurative in that it affronts the current system and partly invokes a new social system, production under a non-capitalist ethic [McFarlane, 1986/7, 5]. Sabotage is a direct attack on the extraction of surplus labour through either ignoring or subverting managerial dictate. While some class struggle libertarians interpreted 'sabotage' in Engels limited sense, the wider interpretation is one that is most compatible with the anarchist-ideal.

2.4. Strike

Anarchism, because it rejects parliamentary reform, has been represented as being only interested in immediate change.³⁵ Yet contemporary anarchists are active in participating and supporting smaller scale strikes. Industrial disputes which appear to consist of action against minor grievances, for instance the reduction of a tea-break by five minutes, are often the result of cumulative frustration with managerial practices [DAM, 1984, 3]. Anarchists, while extending the range of autonomous activity, regard any concession, such as the lengthening of paid breaks that strengthen the revolutionary subject, as partly prefigurative. But strikes are not the only method. If withdrawal of labour is not possible, then harming oneself, or sacrificing sections of the proletariat for a political reason (a technique which anarchist accuse Leninists of) is counter to the prefigurative concept of recomposing oppressed subjects. 'Striking is not a principle, it is a tactic' [Douglass, 1992, 23].

Although Engels places strikes higher up the hierarchy of proletarian action, their effectiveness relies on the exact same features as sabotage, such that Dubois correctly classifies the withdrawal of labour as one of its forms [Dubois, 1979, 21]. The shared characteristics are the withdrawal of profitable efficiency and the replacement of managerial authority, bourgeois rule in its most direct sense, with different forms of social structure. In a very few cases the social arrangements created by the working class in conflict with management are even more repressive than those they are resisting. A rare example would be the whites-only strike organisation of the Billingsgate fish porters or the anti-black workers' group at Imperial Typewriters in 1974 [Black Flame, 1981e, 24-5]. Anarchists reject support for these actions. Likewise the replacement of management by a hierarchical union structure whose leadership have interests distinct from those of the work-force, means that contemporary libertarians, when involved in industrial action, aim to create other structures in which control remains with the workforce [DAM, 1984, 4]. This often manifests itself in preference for wildcat or 'unofficial' stoppages.³⁶

Strikes may flare into a greater conflagration and erupt across contexts, as Luxemburg recognises. Large scale strikes create new links of solidarity, forming new types of identity for those involved, replacing those of the 'happy worker' or 'contented consumer', and creating new forms of social relationships. 'peaceful wage struggles and street massacres, barricade fighting - all these run through another, run side by side, cross one another, flow in and over one another...'
[Luxemburg, 1986, 46]. Strikes are not only a form of sabotage because they reduce managerial control or stored surplus value but also provoke other forms of self-organisation in conflict with bourgeois rule. A meaningful distinction between strikes and product destruction is unsustainable. The miners' strike of 1984-5 necessarily involved destruction of mines, as without maintenance the work-heads flooded. This passive form of sabotage is morally indistinguishable (assuming the level of intent is the same) from active destruction of the coal stocks and is an inescapable part of the industrial conflict.

Many forms of striking can encourage worker passivity. The union representatives try to take control of the negotiation process by maintaining a monopoly on information gathering and distribution to its members, and speak to the established media on their behalf. As secondary and mass picketing is illegal there seems to be little role for the workers themselves. To overcome this potential passive role anarchists prefer other forms of action which place the resisting agents in a position where they are not dependent upon a mediating force.

2.5. Industrial Boycott

There are two versions of the boycott. The first is where wage-earners, as consumers, are encouraged to avoid buying the products of companies in dispute with their workers, an action carried out in support of other industrial methods [Brown, 1990, 12]. The second is when workers 'black' or prohibit the importation or distribution of goods produced by such companies. Employees refuse to carry out labour for businesses that have caused special offence. This second form differs from a strike, because the withdrawal of labour is much more selective.

One of the most recent examples of the second form of boycott was during the Liverpool dockers dispute with the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company and that company's major user, the Atlantic Containers Limited (ACL). Dock-workers throughout the world, especially (but not exclusively) the USA, refused to deal with ACL cargoes in order to put pressure on the sacked dockers' former employers to re-instate them [Dockers Charter, 28 September, 1996, 2-3]. The globalisation of capital places workers in competition with each other in a world-wide market place. Resistance to capitalism, such as the boycott, builds international links of solidarity and resists managerial rights to determine the beneficiaries of dockers' labour. Sabotage is not necessarily individual, nor covert (although it can take those forms), but can be open and collective. Its multiple forms can be prefigurative of new forms of social relation.

2.6. Occupation

Anarchists often consider the occupation of the work-place to be a more effective form of sabotage than strikes. In the 1990 ambulance drivers dispute, the pickets, rather than strike, occupied their stations and ran an ambulance service taking instruction from the public rather than through their management.³⁷ Class War suggests that this form of action, in the context of this period and this service, is preferable to the total withdrawal of labour, for three interrelated reasons. First, it maintains workers' control over those who wish to represent them. Second, occupations effectively resist managerial counter-strategies and expand the arena of solidarity. Finally occupations have a far greater prefigurative character both in their relationship with others (i.e. still assisting the sick) and in their self-organisation.

Possessing the workplace makes it easier for the workers (who in the industrial setting are the predominant agents of change) rather than the union leadership, to remain actively involved and to control the action [Class War No. 38, 3]. DAM argued that it should be no surprise that occupations are preferable because in order to develop they require a greater level of workers' autonomy than strike action '[O]ccupation implies positive action actually to take over a plant and to deny access to the management. [This ...] needs a high level of militancy and solidarity as well as rank-and-file organisation' [DAM, 1980e, 16]. Yet DAM's argument is contentious. It overlooks strikes that also require significant workers' self-organisation, DAM risk creating a hierarchy of industrial action, which predetermines methods according to their assigned position (in the same way as Engels' hierarchy of tactics).

The occupation at the Lip Watch Company strike in France in 1973 was part of a wider industrial dispute that had started with go-slows, machine breaking and product seizure as well as withdrawal of labour [Dubois, 1976, 90-1]. The DAM's hierarchy of industrial action wrongly assumes that in every case sit-ins requires greater organisation, yet sometimes co-ordination occurs spontaneously, developing out of strike activity. Similarly, the opportunity for a successful occupation is often as dependent on disorganisation by management rather than the self-creative abilities of the workforce.

The second argument for preferring the occupation appears to be a purely practical reason, namely that occupying a workplace, prevents replacement labour (scabs) from being brought in [Rocker, 1990e, 71]. Yet, underlying this apparently pragmatic ground, there is the wider implication, that the sit-in provides the opportunity for the workforce to control their immediate environment, determining questions not only of access, but also subverting productive and managerial practices.

The third reason for preferring occupation is its prefigurative character. For an occupation to function successfully workers must create a social network that is independent of managerial structures. 'This dispute has demonstrated how ordinary workers can run an essential emergency service without bureaucratic management. It has been a shining example of workers' control' [Class War, No. 38, 3]. Occupiers, such as at Lip or the ambulance drivers continued their labour albeit under different social conditions.

There are two types of criticism of Lip-style occupation as a prefigurative response. The first comes from Gorz. He argues that self-management is not only impossible because of the reconstitution of the economy with geographically diverse manufacturing units, but also undesirable because such rearrangement of production has de-skilled manufacture [Gorz, 1997, 41 & 48]. The production process is wholly unfulfilling. Attempts to engage the workforce in determining output targets is not only futile but a further repressive restraint on workers' time [Gorz, 1997, 50]. To reduce production time requires heteronomous management, and diminishing work-time should be the goals rather than autonomous production, according to Gorz.

The other criticism questions whether self-managed occupations prefigure a desirable aim. It assesses the reconstitution of hierarchy that accompanies such protest when it reintroduces capitalist relations of exchange. This evaluation comes from the French autonomist-influenced Negation group following the events at Lip. The take-over of production of watches to supplement strike pay was considered a spectacular tactical breakthrough. This tactic not only confronts liberal property rights by the producers reappropriating the product, but also demonstrates the ability for workers to manage themselves. Managerial authority is shown to be redundant [Negation, 1975, 41]. Yet Negation argue that for all its positive features such self-management is nevertheless non-prefigurative as it is self-alienating. Production is performed for wage-labour and so the strikers had become a 'collective capitalist' [Negation, 1975, 52-3]. The aim was still to protect the business enterprise rather than its overthrow [Negation, 1975, 54-5 & 90].

Occupation, however, does not necessarily have to replace managerial capitalism with a self-managed capitalism (as characterised by Gorz). As Negation themselves point out, the rediscovery of living, rather than producing, by the Lip activists often came into conflict with the ethos of commercial manufacturing to provide strike pay [Negation, 1975, 73 & 75]. Occupation and workplace autonomy can subvert factory production for a more liberated ideal. Lamb presents examples where self-management of the factory did not reinstate commodity production but replaced it with carnivalesque creativity.

In the violent struggles against intensive production at the US car plant at Lordstown in 1970 there was an attempt to turn the workshops into swimming pools with high pressure hoses. There were even sabotage competitions to see who could blow an engine up so as to send the bits furthest away [Lamb, 1995, 5].³⁸

Occupation can replace the productive with the ludic ethic. Sabotage is a threat to political movements that just want to replace control of industry and distribution rather than to fundamentally alter the terms by which creativity takes place. The orthodox marxist CGT rejected sabotage because it wanted to take over the means of production and redistribute its commodities not destroy commodity production.³⁹

The possibility that occupiers could be reconstituting a hierarchy also occurs to Class War. During the ambulance dispute, Class War were critical that the drivers did not take the opportunities available to open up the stations to even broader sections of the community.

[A]t the grass roots level, ambulance workers have failed to capitalise upon the support of the working class communities they serve. They should be trying to get people to help with the running of occupied stations, helping maintain vehicles, getting supplies in and so on [Class War, No. 38, 3].

The writer in Class War appears to be taking a Leninist position, commenting on a strike from a supposedly objective position, external to the conflict. However, assuming that the writer is in the community that is being excluded by the strikers, these comments are legitimate. The failure to make connections with other groups could lead to isolation and the reification of identities between a 'key group' and a largely passive set of supporters [Class War, No. 38, 3]. Occupations do not necessarily create elitist divisions, the students who took over the universities in Paris in 1968 opened up the spaces to the workers who had been previously prohibited or inhibited from entering [Solidarity, 1986, 33].

³⁹ The CGT, prior to the First World War when it was anarchist-dominated, yet afterwards only supported sabotage during the Nazi-occupation of France [Dubois, 1979, 68].

Many forms of occupation can be prefigurative. One of the aims, as Tom Brown explains, 'has always been to persuade workers to keep on holding the factories and other plants, never to return them for promises' [Brown, 1990, 15]. However, contrary to Brown, the ultimate objective is beyond simply placing production under syndicalist control, but to alter the very divisions between production, consumption, distribution, adventure and play.

2.7. Go Slow & Working Without Enthusiasm

Engels disparaged other forms of unofficial action as being a sign of political naivety, as he thought that they were individual moments of protest that were unplanned, disorganised and rare. Yet, on the contrary they are often so frequent that it is often forgotten that they do constitute forms of industrial resistance [Lamb, 1995, 4].⁴⁰ Unofficial action can range from apparent tardiness in responding to the phone ringing and the obviously uninterested delivery of sales pitch on answering, to unofficial extra time taken for a break. Although such actions seem to be individual acts of rebellion (in the sense used by Woodcock) such sabotage is more likely to occur if workers can count on mutual solidarity. The reassurance of knowing that a protective excuse will be proffered or sly signal given should managers become inquisitive provides a basis for greater incidents of autonomous activity.

Flynn describes the nineteenth century tactic of the 'ca-canny', when work is purposely performed badly in order to irritate managers and restrict profitability. The ca-canny was used as an immediate response to unsuccessful pay disputes [Flynn, 1995,

11-2]. Such go-slows date back to the earliest days of proletarianisation, in which merchant seafarers were amongst the first [Linebaugh, 1991, 122-3]. Peter Linebaugh presents a list of early Eighteenth Century sailors' terminology for loafing. The specialised vocabulary had the effect of keeping conversation from the ears of interfering authority. 'Manany' and 'King's bencher' were terms which covered the people involved in shirking, while 'Tom Cox's Traverse', 'two turns around the longboat' and a 'pull at the scuttlebutt' were the phrases for work avoidance itself [Linebaugh, 1991, 134]. As such they indicate that resistance to managerial control has never depended on the approval of a revolutionary party, such methods are already features of the survival tactics and humanising routines against work discipline. Go slows may be prompted in reaction to different oppressive practices. They can be an individual desire to work at ones own pace, or as a general reaction against managerial authority [Dubois, 1979, 46]. They are methods of working class autonomy, which are not just of immediate benefit to the agents themselves but they assist in building up networks of trust and hence lead to other tactics.

2.8. Work to Rule

A version of the go-slow recommended by anarchists is the work to rule. In literary form Jaroslav Hasek's Good Soldier Schweik, whose overly assiduous obedience to the orders of his superiors brings them to ruin, exemplifies the work to rule. Practical examples are cited by Brown and Flynn who recount how French railway workers won industrial victories through apparent obedience. The management devise a long list of directives, such that if any accident occurs responsibility is placed on the employee who had not kept a particular rule, yet if workers fully implemented every safety directives, the service would grind to a halt. After an accident management shifted the blame on to the stationmaster on the grounds that he had not followed the regulations. As a protest Fellow employees worked to the letter of the rules and by pursuing the explicit orders of management 'within three days the railroad system of France was so completely demoralized that they had to exonerate this particular station master' [Flynn, 1995, 21 & Brown, 1990, 13]. Such tactics have immediate advantage over activities like strikes in that there is little cost to the worker. Indeed, strikes may benefit employers, as they save on wages while in most instances production quickly recovers and the short fall is soon made up [Dubois, 1976, 35-7].

The work to rule subverts managerial authority through immanent critique. Rather than demonstrating the inadequacy of managerial control through appeals to another ideal, the work to rule demonstrates the inherent contradictions within this form of administration. Such a method leaves authority baffled and appears far wider than in the industrial setting. It can be seen in the actions of children of strictly religious parents who rebel by becoming even more zealous. The work to rule pushes authority to the limits and in the confusion establishes room for greater autonomy.

Such tactics are criticised by Gorz, as the work-to-rule replicates capitalist values and norms. He cites the cases of British workers 'who stop work as soon as the siren goes, no matter how much waste and damage is caused', he reports their attitude:

This sort of resentment is the only form of freedom left to proletarians in 'their' work. They're expected to be passive? Well then, let's be passive. Or more exactly, let us use passivity as a weapon against those who impose it. Since 'their' aim is to create active passivity. This behaviour of resentment which, by overacting the role the worker is expected to play, robs the oppressors of the desired results of their orders, is the last refuge of 'working class dignity'. [....] 'Screw the Bosses!' 'The Gaffer can sort it out!' 'What about our bread!' 'Shit work for shit wages!' The language of proletarian resentment is also the language of impotence [Gorz, 1997, 39].

For Gorz the work-to-rule advances no positive ideals like 'the abolition of wage slavery'. It has no positive ambition, nor does it create values outside of those created by capital [Gorz, 1997, 39-40]. Gorz's criticism ignores fundamental features of the work to rule. The appearance of passivity hides the active autonomy of those involved. Workers are actually making complex choices. They are choosing which ordinances to obey. Some may be discriminatory or anti-social such as the hospital porter refusing entrance to a patient who arrives by taxi rather than ambulance but they may be more socially minded such as applying the strictest implementation of food hygiene or safety standards [Gorz, 1997, 39 & Flynn, 1995, 18].

Second, all rules require interpretation and there is no final determinant for the way these dictates are understood.⁴¹ The work to rule involves employees rejecting both the existing meanings of regulations, and the authority of those who create those definitions. The choice to undertake work-to-rules against the pressures of management, as well as the choice and interpretation of the regulations employed as a block to executive command, indicate neither passivity nor impotence but creative resistance. The structures of support that lie beneath the undermining of managerial authority can be prefigurative.

2.9. Refusal to Work

The term 'sabotage' has been used in this chapter to cover direct action in the industrial arena. To describe similar methods Toni Negri uses the term 'refusal to work'. 'The refusal to work is first and foremost sabotage, strikes, direct action' [emphasis in original - Negri, 1979, 124]. In this chapter, however 'refusal to work' has been used to refer to particular forms of sabotage, namely resistance to enter the labour force at the point of production. This a mode of contestation Negri and other autonomists recognise as a liberating form of industrial direct action, which can be prefigurative, producing innovative forms of social interchange and creative identities.

The conscious withdrawal of the workers efficiency through resistance to managerial authority need not be limited to those who are already employed. Just as businesses plan production and hence recruitment years ahead, so too resistance can take the form of frustrating these corporate strategies. This can involve impeding the flow of workers by encouraging the refusal to work. At its most extreme Flynn argued that birth control can be used as a form of sabotage as it restricts the supply of potential proletarians [Flynn, 1995, 30]. Autonomists have considered the tactic of job refusal as a legitimate mode of working class resistance [Tronti, 1979, 7-21; Negri, 1979, 93-117].⁴² The time freed from work can be used for autonomous activity. As with all the other tactics discussed as sabotage, the refusal to work is contingent on certain social and historical factors. Paid non-work, such as welfare benefits allows for greater refusal of work [Dubois, 1979, 56].

During the 1980s in Britain, the refusal to work was often not an autonomous choice for millions of people. The circumstances of mass unemployment, although encouraged and tolerated by the Thatcher governments as a tool for reducing labour costs and trade union discipline, was also subverted by potential proletarians by using the benefits and free time to 'be creative and to please themselves.' They also created 'collective antagonistic tendencies [...] most notably anarcho-punk, a movement that expressed itself well in the Stop the City demos and the trouble-making elements on the CND demos' [Aufheben, 1998, 12]. Such a tactic is rejected not just by liberals who considered this an abuse of the welfare state, but also by Leninists who considered the lazy as incapable of being good communists [Dubois, 1979, 109].⁴³

The refusal to work is however a set of legitimate tactics. It is:

Tronti was, however, a member of the mainstream Leninist Italian Communist Party [Red Notes, 1979, 21].

[F]irst and foremost, the refusal of the most alienated - and therefore most productive work. Secondly, it is the refusal of capitalist work as such - i.e. of exploitation in general. And thirdly, it is a tendency towards a renewal of the mode of production, towards an unleashing of the proletariat's powers of invention [Negri, 1979, 127].

It attacks the profits of capitalist enterprises and evolves alternatives to the social factory by creating new forms of fulfilling endeavour. Rather than necessarily being a response by indolent individuals it can be a means for greater activity, as the peace convoys, the eco-warriors and the road protestors demonstrated.

The refusal to work is provocative. It rejects the role of the worker which state- and reformist-socialists wish to maintain through restructuring capitalism to 'preserve work' [Class War 'We Have Our Own Idea of Time and Motion' edition, 3]. The refusal also opposes the identification of the unemployed working class as passive victims. It spurns the few, but spectacular, rewards of disciplined proletarian existence. The trade union based anarchist Douglass correctly notes that what upsets critics who condemn the convoy, such as Labour MP Terry Fields, is their self-creativity and fulfilment.

They're fucking enjoying themselves! How dare those Hippies have fun when they're not working. You supposed to be all defeated and desperate and hung up and grateful to smug gits like Fields. Instead, here are people who've accepted it's a waste of time trying to find work, grovelling along to petty tin gods, they've actually gone to try and live their lives another way and have fun [Douglass, 1992, 19].

There is a danger that the refusal to work (in the limited, non-Negrian sense) comes to be thought of as the technique of the revolutionary vanguard. Certainly there have been tendencies in overtly lifestylist anarchism, but in some class struggle groupings, to promote dropping out as the strategy and those who acted in this way as being the advanced vanguard class [Fox, 1988, 6].

They say "get a job". A job? More like slavery. So you can stuff your crappy jobs. If we want money, then we will just have to find ways of getting some. It can be done - and it's a damn sight better than working for a living [Attack International, Attack Attack Attack Attack: The Voice of Respectable Moderation, 24].⁴⁴

Yet for many, there is no welfare state, and the commons, another potential source of 'free goods', have been enclosed. In Britain 16 and 17 year olds can no longer claim Income Support and a system of work-fare has been increasingly implemented. Housing benefit rights have been severely curtailed for those under 25, while disability benefit and other forms of welfare have also been reduced, making it more difficult to opt out of employment [Aufheben, 1998, 13-4]. Even where a basic benefits system does exist, it is often so inadequate that it is necessary to sell ones' labour for a wage (whether in the formal economy or on its fringes) in order to meaningfully participate in social life.

⁴⁴ See too the letter by F (Liverpool) in Subversion which posits the greater revolutionary potential of unemployment. 'Jobs/wages invariably leads us to shackling ourselves to the baubles that capitalism dangles before us incessantly - drop out and do something that hurts capitalism instead of meandering along inside its poxy system' [Subversion No. 23, 10]. Subversion did not agree.

2.10. Absenteeism and Sick-In

As the globalisation of the economy forces nation states to cut social costs, the total rejection of work becomes increasingly difficult, as the social wage is reduced. However, the temporary refusal to work through such practices as taking a sick day or sneaking off home has been approved as a method for gaining some autonomy from the regimentation of capitalist production [Platania, 1979, 172] (fig. 5.3.).⁴⁵ It can be traced back to the pre-industrial epoch when artisans would organise their time rather than having their labour regimented. Festivities and holidays were the norm and included the practice of celebrating 'saint Monday' [Dubois, 1979, 54].

Phoning in sick has been strongly advocated by the more individualist, art-provocative, Decadent Action group,⁴⁶ but it has also been used by less self-consciously avant garde subjects. Due to the employment conditions at British Airways, strike action was near impossible, so in 1997 when staff had a grievance they all arranged to telephone in sick on ⁴⁵ 'I wonder if I can sneak home early? I'm half asleep anyway - they'll never miss me' [Class War, 'We Have Our Own Idea of Time and Motion' edition, 3].

the same day. Such action was successful as part of a purely industrial campaign. The sick day was also part of the J18 events. It was suggested that taking that Friday off as paid absence would be a protest against work, and also allow participants to fully engage in the days' events.⁴⁷

Contrary to Engels' taxonomy, sabotage or direct action in the workplace is a multifaceted approach to repressive conditions. It encompasses many diverse but complimentary tactics, including the withdrawal of labour that Engels considered superior. Sabotage does not infer anti-organisation, as even apparently spontaneous acts can take place in a background of friendship networks and non-formal support. Although some anarcho-syndicalists give strategic precedence to the mass strike, contemporary anarchists recognise that no singular form of industrial method can be acontextually advanced. Despite the fact that some revolutionary syndicalists still give primacy to industrial workers and hence their methods, even contemporary anarcho-syndicalists like SolFed place an increasing emphasis on forms of resistance and self-activity outside of the workplace.

3. Methods of Propaganda

The division of workplace from non-workplace is entirely provisional. The continued use of the distinction is pragmatic, reflecting, in part, current usage rather than a commitment to this distinction. Some methods, like propaganda, sabotage and theft have direct counterparts at the point of immediate manufacture. Others, like the consumer boycott, appear to complement industrial tactics, but can be significantly different. Propaganda is a method that bestrides even the supposed division between industrial and community action. As touched upon earlier the industrial/communal distinction, with regard to tactics and subjects is contextual and not universal. The creation of communication is common to no particular sphere and often interweaves the two. Propaganda by deed, expresses dissatisfaction and identifies causes of torment. It is used both within and outside the point of production. Berkman's unsuccessful attempt on the life of Henry Frick, for instance, was in support of murdered strikers. So too propaganda by word, and the creation of situations and stunts (discussed below) are not particular to any specific domain.

3.1. Propaganda By Deed

As was seen in the discussion concerning organisation, syndicates associated with workplace activity and the small groups identified with propaganda by deed, are not competing forms of organisation, with one superseding the other. Such organisational techniques were used interchangeably and inter-dependently rather than mutually exclusively. It is not a matter of either/or, but different choices and combinations of tactic utilised that depend on the social practices and judicial constraints operating at the time.

Propaganda by deed is most often associated with individual terror, and in particular assassination [Miller, 1984, 99], but its origins lie in Carlo Priscane's belief that the deed promotes the idea [Woodcock, 1975, 308]. 'Propaganda by deed' as a result refers to a much wider variety of actions than solely (anti-)political execution, being almost synonymous with 'direct action' [Miller, 1984, 98]. It was Auguste Valliant's and Francois-Claudius

Ravachol's activities that encouraged the conflation of propaganda by deed with murder, and with the lesser crimes of theft and arson [Parry, 1987, 11]. The terroristic version of propaganda by deed may rightly be denounced when it recreates hierarchy, but these objections are contingent, not necessary, features. In some circumstances propaganda by deed when allied with other tactics, or when other alternative tactics are denied, is consistent with the model of direct action. It can be prefigurative, engaging the subjugated agent in a manner congruent with anarchist anti-hierarchical goals.

The main arguments denouncing terroristic propaganda by deed have originated from pacifists, predominantly using the argument from prefiguration, which has already been examined [see Chapter II]. It states that if anarchism demands that the means must be in accordance with the ends, and the forms of social relations they desire are non-violent, then their methods have to be pacific. As was noted earlier, this argument is inadequate as 'violence' is a flexible term which is often used pejoratively to describe forceful actions that the speaker has already prejudged as unacceptable, rather than found unacceptable because of the use of brute power. Pacifism may be less prefigurative than a violent act. Others have criticised propaganda by deed for hitting random or inappropriate targets. French illegalists, for instance, followed the anti-semitism of Proudhon. Richard Parry, the historian of the French anarchist bandits the Bonnot Gang, recounts the list of acceptable victims for illegalists: 'pawn shops, bureaux de change and post offices [...] bankers, lawyers, Jews(!)' [Parry, 1987, 13]. Yet other propagandists by deed were not so prejudiced and were selective in their targets.⁴⁸

⁴⁸ Targets included The French Chamber of Deputies, President Sadi Carnot, the house of President Benoit,

Even the supposedly indiscriminate violence of Emile Henry's attack on the Cafe Terminus [Woodcock, 1975, 292-3] was in fact carefully chosen [Black Flag Supplement No. 3, 5]. The AB and ALF were similarly discerning in their targets.

As discussed in Chapter Four Leninist and statist terrorist groups, such as the IRA or ETA, tend to regard their actions as the central strategy for liberation, and this has been true of some anarchist groupings (illegalists) who committed outrages to support a wider cause [Parry, 1987, 28]. Their acts were to emancipate the subject. As a result, as Attack International described, terrorist organisations see themselves as a benign vanguard acting on behalf of others. Their paternalism however suppressed autonomous agitational activity by the client group recreating hierarchy [Attack Attack Attack, 13]. The separation between terrorist and supported subject group still occurs even with the open cell system, as illegal acts, especially spectacular ones, require the perpetrators to act in great secrecy and isolation.

Other illegalists were far more individualist, and rejected any collectivist intention. 'Illegal acts were to be done simply to satisfy one's desires, not for the greater glory of some external "ideal"' [Parry, 1987, 15]. These egoist anarchists avoided the paternalism of strategic propagandist by deed, but regarded liberation in terms of Stirnerite rebellion. These individualists, who rejected class struggle and collectivist methods had nothing but disdain for other subjugated subjects and other methods of revolt. The actions of the individualist ubermensch (superior man) took precedence over those of the common mob, thereby further reducing the autonomy of the oppressed [Parry, 1987, 24, 25 & 28]. The social relations the individualist terrorist created within the gang, as well as those established with non-illegalist anarchists and other oppressed subjects, lacked comradeship and reciprocity and were not synecdochic of a beloved community [Parry, 1987, 59].

the state prosecutor Bulot and the Lobau barracks in Paris as well as illegitimate assaults such as Ravachol's murder of two old women who ran an iron-mongers shop [Woodcock, 1975, 283-94 & Joll, 1964, 128-38].

Both individualist and collectivist propagandists by deed tend to regard their targets as being central. A strategic view of struggle is conceived where one set of targets will bring about a millennial revolution. Terrorist actions as well as being occasionally necessary, carry a symbolic meaning. Those carrying them out expect that the metaphors embodied in their behaviours will be understood by the oppressed groups who observe the act. The Baader-Meinhoff Gang hoped that their act of blowing up a German based Zionist organisation would be recognised as part of a wider struggle against imperialism. As the bombing took place on the anniversary of Kristelnacht it was unsurprisingly interpreted somewhat differently. Those carrying out the attacks, however, are in a different position to other oppressed agents, including those they wish to help. As a result, the symbolic meaning of this form of direct action can be differently read. Many of the Protestant working class in the Six Counties, interpret particular bombings differently to their Catholic counterparts. As Gregor Kerr of the WSM points out such vanguard examples of 'armed struggle' rather than resolving sectarian conflict, which is how the guerrillas want them to be read, act to reinforce the division [Kerr, 1998-99, 34].

The dominant powers, such as the British state, will attempt to impose their meanings onto the symbolic features of individual terror. Such manipulations of interpretation can be more successfully resisted when the readers of the symbolic feature are also the ones carrying out the act, as they already understand the tactic and what it prefigures. The smaller the involvement, such as acts of individual terror, the greater the dependency on the symbolic power for its effectiveness, and the greater the potential that heteronomous powers can apply 'spin', re-integrating the metaphor into its own symbolic order.

Some acts of individual terror can still be consistent with the ideal, being acts which are not the primary tactic, are aimed at supporting wider struggles and carried out by oppressed agents themselves in order to equalise disproportionate power relationships. They do not impose a single specific interpretation, nor to take a central role or replace other methods. In most major disruptions, where myriad local actions interact and coalesce, incidents occur which may appear to be propaganda by deed. The targeting of a Mercedes show-room for violent assault during the J18 in 1999 or the arson attacks on the Apartheid South African embassy during the Poll Tax riots of 1990, could be represented as propaganda by deed. They are compatible with ideal-types of anarchism as they are not vanguard actions.

3.2. Propaganda By Word

'Freedom of the press belongs to those who own one' [Hoffman, 1971, vi].

'Propaganda', has connotations of 'brainwashing' and 'distortion', information imparted to have a prescribed effect. It has additional undertones of hierarchy and coercion. This is due partly to the instrumental character of propaganda, so that even the messages intended to have benign ends are regarded as manipulative and demeaning. The term, however, is often used in a less pejorative way by radicals. Anarchists admit that their news-sheets are propaganda, as they have explicit aims, namely 'putting over a revolutionary message' [ACF, 1997, 22]. Yet having a message to impart is true of any form of communicative act, anarchists being explicit about their goals. Critics of the more mainstream media, such as Chomsky or the Oxford based Institute of Social Disengineering,⁴⁹ indicate, that network (corporate) news also have explicit and implicit political aims although not of the revolutionary variety [Herman & Chomsky, 1988, Chomsky, 1993, Institute of Social Disengineering, 1994].⁵⁰

The message is only one part of the operation of propaganda. Other factors are also pivotal; the choice of media for the bulletins, their style, tone, choice of images, mode of production and distribution, the intended constituency and the audience's relationships and involvement with these communications are also integral aspects of the role of propaganda. For consistent anarchists, their propaganda must be compatible with direct action. Relations of production, for instance, must be non-hierarchical and the images, format and relationship with the readers must be prefigurative.

The established media, identified as that which is either state-controlled (such as the BBC) or owned by large, wealthy corporations, or funded through advertising revenue, have interests which are antipathetic to anarchism [Institute of Social Disengineering, 1994, 7]. As a result separate organs of communication are necessary.

⁵⁰ See too Class War's Neil Warne, 1991, 16

The current mass media is a creation of those in control, those who hold the purse strings and power. We as individuals oppose all this, and we can and must change it by our deeds. So don't hate the media, become the media of the future [Editorial, Direct Action, No. 1, Autumn 1996, 1].

Most anarchist groups organise predominantly around the production of their propaganda, and for many it remains their main method. In this respect there appear to be similarities between libertarians and Leninists, as orthodox socialist movements are based around the production and distribution of their journal. Bob Drake, a former member of the British Communist Party, reports how in the 1950s much of the organisational structure and the Party's events were based on and around the propaganda sheet. The SWP and the Socialist Party also lay great emphasis on the importance of their respective publications: Socialist Worker and The Socialist.⁵¹ There are, however, differences between anarchist and orthodox marxist papers. Chris Atton, in his analysis of revolutionary propaganda, uncovers significant differences between the production methods and internal structures of anarchist magazines, in particular Green Anarchist and those of the Morning Star and Socialist Worker. Whilst Green Anarchist is not a class-struggle magazine it is one which is close to such groups participating with them on AEA and MA'M activities. So, the analysis provided by

Atton does provide a useful indication of the differences between libertarian and orthodox marxist propaganda. Morning Star and Socialist Worker replicate the hierarchies of capitalist media businesses, with editors overseeing reporters, staff writers and specialist technical staff while Green Anarchist creates structures to dissipate power [Atton, 1999, 35-6].

The arrangements for production and distribution of propaganda reflect and often form the formal organisation, because the production of propaganda is considered one of the most influential methods for any revolutionary movement. So important is the distribution of information and analysis that it was proposed that one of the identifying criteria for a healthy active group is one that publishes its own material [Otter, 1971, 8]. The American CIA (Central Intelligence Agency), reportedly, also judge the vigour of the radical movement through the vitality of the available alternative press [Atton, 1999, 26]. Propaganda production is intricately and intimately bound to anarchist organisation.

Written propaganda remains one of the main tactical-cum-organisational methods for British anarchists. Even MA'M, one of the few predominantly anarchist groups which has no ambition to produce a regular bulletin, newspaper or journal, advertise their irregular events through a steady stream of fliers, stickers and posters. They have a flexible organisational structure to encourage independent production and distribution. CWF became increasingly centralised as the imperative grew to standardise publication and increase the quality of their tabloid. The organisation of the group and the publishing of propaganda are indistinguishable: Green Anarchist's 'self-definition [is] as movement and magazine' [Atton, 1999, 45].

Anarchists' stress on the micro-political has often resulted in their preference for local publications over national ones.⁵² Regional magazines and newspapers can, because of the smaller scale, experiment in organisational methods and avoid the hierarchies associated with Leninist publications. Lenin, by contrast, favoured the national, rather than regional, agitational newspaper [Lenin, 1963, 165 & 168-9]. The intrinsic link between the propagation of information and organisation is deliberate. Anarchist publishing, in its ideal form, should prefigure the desired social and organisational structures. 'The alternative press will exhibit the primary characteristics of the new protest: direct participation and local, grass-roots decision-making where resources are diffused and shared within and between groups' [Atton, 1999, 33]. Atton argues that Green Anarchist is successful in dispersing power and resources and creating opportunities for developing new skills, to a far greater degree than traditional Leninist publications or the underground magazines such as Oz.

The hierarchical divide between the producers and audience for anarchist publications is dissolved. Readers have considerable access to influencing the contents and many take advantage of this. Nearly half of Green Anarchist is composed of articles written by the readership (excluding the large letters section which is almost entirely free of editorial control). Approximately a quarter of the content comes from the editors, and a smaller percentage emanating from known thinkers in the anarchist milieu (people like Zerzan, Black, John ⁵² See for instance the account of Swansea's Alarm by. I. (Bristol), 1998, 8-9.

Moore) [Atton, 1999, 41-2]. In anarchist papers the creation of propaganda is open to all, indeed almost all the main anarchist publications invite not just letters but articles as well.⁵³ Some offer opportunities for greater participation from the readership.⁵⁴ In Leninist publications, by contrast, the readership is essentially passive, while the newspaper disseminates the message of the party leadership. Neither membership nor readership are involved in dialogue with the newspaper [Drake, 1993, 7]. Readers' contributions are confined to small sections such as the 'letters page'.

Contemporary anarchists, consistent with the ideal, rather than having trained specialists, the opportunity is available to undertake the skilled jobs of publishing, such as typesetting, proof-reading, lay out and design. This open approach helps extend the opportunity to learn skills, and ensures that publication is not dependent upon one person or clique. The downside is the notoriously amateurish appearance of anarchist publication, especially Green Anarchist. Animal, also the product of non-media professionals, boasted its amateurism with the sub-heading on one edition, 'The magazine whose content is better than its layout (sic)'

⁵³ The ACF write: 'Please feel welcome to contribute articles to Organise! as long as they don't conflict with our Aims and Principles we will publish them. (Letters, of course, need not agree with our A&Ps [Aims and Principles] at all.)' [Organise! No. 51, 2]. See too ContraFLOW, August/September 1995, 2; Smash Hits No. 1, 1 and its marginal modification in Smash Hits No. 3, 1 & Direct Action No. 11, 2.

[Animal, No. 3, 1].⁵⁵ Circulation of the location for editorial control and printing has also been a factor in libertarian production. Here and Now, for instance, would alternate editorship between groups in Yorkshire and Scotland and other national anarchist groups such as the pre-1990s CWF had similar arrangements [Solidarity No. 13, 5-6].

The importance of presenting anarchist arguments has long been considered a key tactic. William Godwin, regarded by Rucker, Marshall and Woodcock as a precursor to British anarchism, felt that reason alone is a sufficient tool for creating a liberated society.

Coercion has nothing in common with reason, and therefore can have no proper tendency to the cultivation of virtue.... Reason is omnipotent: if my conduct be wrong, a very simple statement, flowing from a clear and comprehensive view, will make it appear as such; nor is it probable that there is any perverseness that would persist in vice, in the face of all the recommendations with which virtue might be invested, and all the beauty in which it might be displayed [Godwin, 1971, 250].

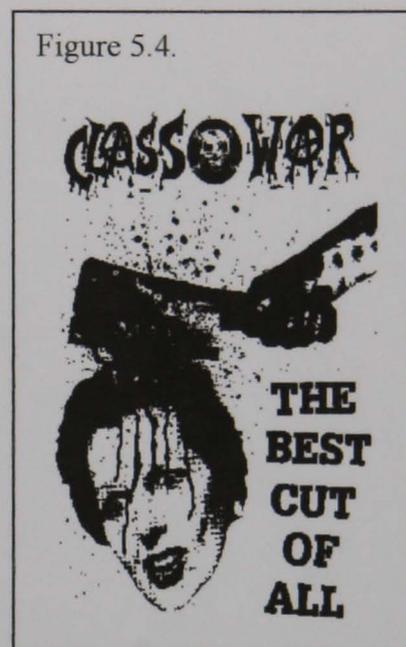

Contemporary Anarchists are critical of such a liberal approach. Godwin's agent, the abstract individual, and singular view of rationality are divorced from economic conditions or material practices. Contemporary libertarians would also reject his preference for reform rather than insurrection [Godwin, 1986, 121].⁵⁶ Yet they would also see reasoned argument as a part of their propaganda, although not the only part.

Critics of British anarchists have looked at their printed output and concluded that the movement lacks rigour and is suffused only with a naive instinctive rebellion. Class War's approach, in particular, is targeted for its 'anti-intellectualism' (figure 5.4.). Their provocative, populist propaganda marked them out as an irrational group who 'never achieved [an] adequate theory'.⁵⁷ Class War are certainly professedly anti-academic, but British anarchism does have a sophisticated analysis of appropriate actions. Even Class War's 'retarding influence' diagnosed by Aufheben of colloquial, rather than theoretical complex propagandising is a result of a particular anti-representative, prefigurative approach [Aufheben No.6, 41].

Liberal anarchists follow Leninists in believing that they have to instruct the masses, and this results in the pedagogic tone of their propaganda. Thayer in his account of the British libertarian movement, then dominated by non-class struggle groupings, says that they 'take themselves far too seriously; they also think that satire is decadent' [Thayer, 1965, 153]. Class struggle anarchists, by contrast, have long addressed their readers in a more familiar tone. From the earliest periodicals, Johann Most used irony and ridicule in his newspaper [Trautmann, 1980, 138]. His engaging hyperbole was partly responsible for his imprisonment in Britain (see Chapter One).

⁵⁶ See too Marshall, 1984, 77

Front Cover of Organise!

Abrasive humour is not unique to Class War in the anarchist movement (fig. 5.5.). The ACF, during the 1990-1 Gulf War parodied Leninist support for the Saddam Hussein's Ba'athist authoritarian regime in a satirical front cover. Regional groupings in particular continue Most's tradition of having an authorial accent that is coloured by abrasive humour.⁵⁸ This is deliberate. The use of humour and everyday vernacular eliminates the division between ⁵⁸ See for instance Xtra!, Police News: For Nonviolent Authoritarianism, Gravesend's The Gravedigger and Swansea's Angry Side. Purkis finds it too in Donald Rooum's Wildcat cartoon, a mainstay of Freedom [Purkis, 1997, 78] and often reprinted in Workers Solidarity.

(anti-)politics and 'everyday life' and helps, prefiguratively, to make resistance enjoyable [Class War, 1991e, 13]. Bone describes how the newspaper kept altering its presentation to avoid reification. Staid propaganda can be assimilated into the dominant symbolic order, restricting its participatory audience and limiting its possible meanings.

After a while it became obvious that the paper in its particular form had its limitations. Whilst it had been successful [...] in putting Class War on the political map, and developed a loyal following amongst many otherwise unpoliticised working class people, it still only appealed to a relatively small section of the working class.

We had, in effect created a new 'Class War Ghetto' and it was obvious that a new-style, even more 'populist' paper was required to break out of it [Bone, 1987, 6-7].

Class War continued to evolve, and when the majority of its producers felt it could no longer reinvent itself, they unsuccessfully tried to end it. While it was occasionally predictable, and often self-conscious in its parody of its image as the mob with attitude, its insults and humour were well considered. By mocking and abusing the powerful, Class War 'tries to encourage and increase the confidence, the autonomy, initiative and solidarity of working class people' [Class War, 1991e, 12]. This was in contrast to

Humour is an important feature of anarchist propaganda whether it be Class War, Evading Standards, regional publications such as Where's My Giro or campaign centred propaganda such as striking Wapping printers' version of The Sun. The light-heartedness suggests a lack of didacticism. For the comedy to work there has to be a sharing of values with the readership. The reader is complicit in considering the butt of the joke to deserve denigration. The spoof page three 'hospitalised coppers' is knowingly unappealing to law-and-order authoritarians and this adds to the readers' pleasure. Discriminatory and authoritarian groupings and individuals also use comedy for their ends but there are important differences, in particular in the choice of the butt of the joke.

For anarchists, ridicule is aimed at two types of target; firstly it targets those who wield greater heteronomous power, in order to encourage the readership to recognise that the dominant group are not all-powerful. Second, the writers of the propaganda themselves are ridiculed. This latter target may occasionally lead to the creation of in-jokes that alienate the general reader, reducing the potential effectiveness. The primary impression, nonetheless, is to demonstrate the provisional nature of the group or publication. Mockery undermines authority.⁵⁹ By laughing at themselves,

Because 'satire' is what I did, I had always tried to pretend to myself it was a worthy and important pursuit with tremendous political anarchists indicate, and encourage others to recognise, that their grouping is contingent and not strategically necessary. The publication of propaganda written in a colloquial form, a characteristic of British anarchism from before the twentieth century, also undermines vanguard organisation which considers that an elite educated in the appropriate theory is a prerequisite. Class War's informality implies that the hierarchies of party-leadership, with its specific roles for instructive theoreticians, are unnecessary [Class War, 1991e, 10-12].

Critics argue that anarchists', and in particular Class War's, populist approach is patronising, as its self-conscious parodying of tabloid humour 'reduced all the individual and collective diversity of real people down to a convenient lowest common denominator' [Aufheben No. 6, 40-1]. The populist journalism which Class War adopted 'was an invention of middle class tabloid hacks which claimed to speak for and represent the working class - but like all media representatives, the real function was to pacify and manipulate' [Aufheben No. 6, 41]. There is also the suggestion that Class War's use of the populist approach is indicative of a desire to create a vanguard body. 'Underlying this populism were certain patronizing assumptions about what the "average prole" was capable of comprehending and what projected image of Class War would make them weapon. I had read a book entitled Wit as Weapon which described the importance of the Berlin cabaret as a form of opposition to the Nazis in the 1930s. At the back of my mind was a niggling worry. If my historical knowledge served me right, weren't the Nazis in a fairly strong position by the end of the 1930s [O'Farrell, 1998, 260]?

most popular to the largest number of "average proles" [Aufheben, No. 6, 41-2].⁶⁰

Class War's response is to accuse critics of jealousy on the basis that the tens of thousands bought their paper in comparison to those of their antagonists [Class War No. 73, 2] and by inference that their readers were unlikely to support the publication if they felt patronised by it. Yet, while Class War is right to celebrate the accessibility of their propaganda, a constituency beyond a small arena of activists, this is not an adequate reply to the charge of being patronising. The red-top, mainstream tabloids have circulation thousands of times higher than Class War yet, although more entertaining than their broadsheet partners, they still stereotype and demean the identities of their working class readers.⁶¹ A better defence is that alongside the newspaper they also produced thought-provoking theoretical publications. The journal The Heavy Stuff, as well as their book Unfinished Business, indicates that they did not perceive their readers as unenquiring. A critic of Class War, William Dixon, in the journal Radical Chains notes 'behind their paper there was indeed not just careful thought but also knowledge of what needed to be fact'. Their objective was 'to make everyone an intellectual' rather than have a 'Dictatorship of the intellectuals' [Dixon, 1997, 33].

Aufheben's hypothesis that Class War's rhetoric is just a middle class fabrication, an effort by do-gooders to purposely talk down to its readership is worth-raising as, if true, it would indicate that

Class War is paternalistic rather than liberatory. As Chapter Three demonstrated the anarchist ideal notion of class is much broader and contextual than that offered by orthodox marxism. However, even if the narrow Leninist measure of class is used as a guide, the evidence suggests that Aufheben's, appraisal is questionable (at least for the period up to 1991). Although there is no comparable breakdown of the writers of Class War to that provided by Atton for Green Anarchist, a speculative, sociological analysis of the class-backgrounds of two of the three editors of Decade of Disorder does suggest that Class War was written by members of the (orthodox marxist) revolutionary subject, the working class. Ian Bone is the child of domestic servants,⁶² and Alan Pullen is a plumber⁶³ while only the shadowy Tim Scargill's origins (and motivations) are open to question.⁶⁴ The journalist Rob Yates describes others associated with Class War as 'labourers, clerical workers, unemployed'.⁶⁵

There are certainly tendencies within Class War,⁶⁶ which grew as time went on, which suggested that it regarded itself as a vanguard organisation. The desperation to keep their federation going⁶⁷ suggests that some regard the organisation as necessary and pivotal. Nonetheless, the efforts to create a popular, entertaining and engaging paper which encourages self-education [Dixon, 1997, 33] as well as autonomous participation indicates that these strategic, vanguardist elements are more often subordinate than dominant.

One of the problems with anarchist propaganda has been its inadvertent role in the commodification of revolt. The SI described the phenomena whereby radical activity is denuded of its ability to contest by being turned into a product that can be bought and sold alongside other goods and services. Alienation, the product of a specific form of society (class-based) actually appears to be all-embracing. The individual remedy for this isolation seems to be through embracing spectacular roles, consuming products of ersatz rebellion. The merchandising, whether of T-shirts and golf-umbrellas emblazoned with 'radical phrases', packages discontent as another form of commodity.⁶⁸ Rather than destroying market relations, it simply extends the range of goods on offer.

In an effort to counteract this process, some radical groups distribute their products for free. Anarchist Theft, ContraFLOW, Counter Information, Evading Standards, Proletarian Gob, Resistance, SchNews and Subversion, have all been distributed without charge. The SI's own journal was also potlatched.⁶⁹ Such methods of distribution and exchange are prefigurative. Contemporary class struggle anarchists are against all forms of market economy and consider that free distribution helps prevent recuperation. Gifts dispensed without obligation, created for the pleasure of producing and the delight of giving, applies not just to propaganda. Free food is distributed at festivals and demonstrations, other 'senseless act[s] of beauty' are features of the TAZ, the riot and the prank. Non-obligatory gifts stand as an alternative to capitalism. Despite anarchists' attempts to encourage new forms of distribution, based on pleasure rather than profit, recuperative processes have intervened. Even potlatched revolutionary tracts have been subsumed into the order of commodities. An original complete set of the SI's journals now exchanges hands for hundreds of pounds.

The internet, as discussed in Chapter IV, also provides an opportunity for free communication, although accessing information requires a substantial initial outlay in computer hardware, or requires a job which has such access. The drawback, as the A(C)F acknowledge, is that the readership is predominantly, although not exclusively, occidental and specific to certain professional positions [Organise!, No. 46, 8]. Nonetheless all the main British class struggle groups except, at this point (January 2000), the anti-technology Green Anarchist movement, have a presence on the World Wide Web [Appendix Two]. Even amongst the techno-sceptics, writers for Green Anarchist such as Harry Shlong, have pointed to the positive possibilities opened up by 'these new forms of communication' which are 'outside traditional institutions of state broadcast and communication control' [Shlong, 1994, 11]. The Internet and email news-groups provide media for expression, allow for ease of communication between groups and assist in the co-ordinating of activities as well as engaging new participants. Like all libertarian revolutionary action electronic propaganda seeks to extend the scope of participation.

Contemporary anarchists do not just propagandise through texts (newspapers, magazines books and pamphlets). The 1994 ten day 'Anarchy in the UK' festival that took place in London (October 21st -30th), was organised by Bone, and included a significantly cultural input, including bands, film, cabaret, comedy and poetry, as well as more traditional (anti-)political demonstrations and meetings (fig. 5.7.). For Davies 'Anarchy in the UK' is evidence of British anarchism's appreciation of a 'connection between anarchist politics and popular culture' [Davies, 1997, 64]. However, anarchists have long recognised that diverse social practices interweave in constructing functional control. Whitechapel's Jubilee Club, supported by Der Arbiter Faint, housed theatre, poetry and musical events to create a culture of resistance. Class War, amongst others, was reviewed films and used popular cultural icons in their propaganda. The ACF over a series of issues of Organise! considered how periodical based propaganda is not the only form for promoting anti-representative tactics and ideas. Poetry, film, music and theatre can also be used, both in terms of

Other culture forms are also used. Cinema, music and theatre have been vehicles for anarchist sentiment. They also attempt, through their dramatic structures, to critique the hierarchy inherent within artistic practices. In the comedic play Accidental Death of an Anarchist, the autonomist-influenced author, Dario Fo, has his characters stand outside of the narrative of his drama, to comment on the conventions of theatre, such as the paucity of roles for women. In Situationist forays into cinema the aim was to provoke the audience out of their passive consumer role [Jappe, 1999, 49]

Anarchist cultural techniques uncover the manner in which varieties of media instruct and inform. Libertarian art practices are not necessarily didactic in content, although some are, but these interventions draw attention to the way dominant cultural forms operate, a method that the situationists called detournement [Plant, 1992, 86-7]. The conventional comic strips that provide role models for upstanding citizens in the Western, especially American, world were parodied. In the 1960s Mickey Mouse was shown as a junkie, Oz's Rupert the Bear became a decidedly sexual being, Olive Oyl gave powerful speeches on Women's Liberation to Popeye and Superheroes debated marxist cultural theory [Dickinson, 1997, 47].⁷¹ In the 1980s Tin Tin with Captain Haddock became class struggle heroes concerned with issues of race, gender and sexuality [Attack Attack Attack Attack, 11 & Daniels, 1989]. The unorthodox adventures of old cartoon characters draws attention to the absences of issues of class and the presumptions of liberal, imperialism within mainstream comics.

Other methods such as graffiti are also used to mark out territory, to warn and to inform.

To re-raise awareness of the other areas of working class culture we are interested in, and also to make unfashionable and smother the other ideas, our slogans, ideas and our symbols should confront our class every day. Every day they are faced with pro-capitalist and racist media, sexist and reactionary graffiti and conversation. It must be the job of all of us (sorry if this sounds melodramatic) to take up pens and spray cans and reclaim the walls of our areas [Kenny, 1988e, 17].

Such interventions also question property rights. Billboard pitches are detoured, to mock the product advertised. Such intercessions uncover the means by which promotions attempt to seduce and pacify and the oppressive presuppositions that underlie the product and its representations.⁷²

To return to a more British phenomenon, punk not only had confrontational lyrics, but also through its subversion of commercial rock-and-roll, drew attention to the spectacular function of the band and the quiescent, function of the listeners. The punk movement also critically attacked hierarchical constructs such as 'talent', 'skill' and 'originality' in order to promote greater participation [Plant, 1992, 145 & Rosen, 1997, 103-6]. Groups like Chumbawamba use their music to espouse anarchist ideas and help fund various ventures. Crass displayed through their lyrics and album designs how multinational record labels sought to control and profit from youthful discontent. Crass attempted to develop, albeit in a liberal fashion, alternative means of production and distribution to counter these corporations. However, as the final issue of the unified Class War self-critically points out, too frequently the culture they helped generate was often exclusively white, unintentionally inhibiting involvement from other oppressed agents [Class War No. 73, 5].

3.3. Situations

The SI define 'constructed situations' as: 'A moment of life concretely and deliberately constructed by the collective organisation of a unitary ambience and a game of events' [Situationist International, 1989c, 45]. Creating situations involves using the technologies and practices developed under capitalism in order to overcome these repressive conditions. Just as the apparent oppositional forces can be recuperated into capitalism, so too 'everything which appears within spectacular society can be reclaimed by the consciousness which seeks to subvert it' [Plant, 1992, 32]. Rather than being constrained by the conditions of capitalism which create alienating situations, the agent should act to overcome these restraints [Plant, 1992, 20-1].

The creation of situations is pivotal to the Situationists. Their tactic has a twofold character. 'Our central idea is that of the construction of situations, that is to say, the concrete construction of momentary ambiances of life and their transformation into a superior passional quality' [Debord, 1989, 22]. The first point is that the situation involves contesting forms of oppressive power. The second characteristic of the situation is that it creates temporary, immediate moments of autonomy [Situationist International, 1989b, 43]. Situations are a form of TAZ. The second feature is that taking part in situations carries a synecdochic message to the participants. The situationists explain that the role of creators of situations must be temporary in order to prevent the recreation of hierarchy [Situationist International, 1989b, 44].

Temporary and playful situations take many forms. It can be a gathering of people for some emotional event or an intervention into other formal spectacular cultural activities, such as interrupting a film show, or disrupting the planned city [Situationist International, 1989b, 44 & Debord, 1989, 23]. Groups such as RTS have constructed contemporary situations. The priority given to the transport commodities over the desires and safety of residents is challenged by locals taking over the highways [Wall, 2000, 63]. Stop the City demonstrations and even, claims Plant, (anti-)political riots, such as the 1990 Poll Tax uprising in Trafalgar Square, are examples of a situation [Plant, 1992, 31].

3.4. Pranks and Stunts

Stunts are very similar to situations but have an additional characteristic, namely that the imaginative interaction is aimed at the mainstream media, the intention being that they broadcast the prank to a wider public. The established media may not be aware that it is being manipulated. Unlike situations and orthodox anarchist propaganda, the stunt interrupts and undermines the symbolic order through the dominant means of communication.

The 'Spectacle' is not just the amalgamation of arresting images but refers to the social relationships created through these mediated images [Debord, 1983, para 4]. To interrupt such hierarchical symbolic orders is in itself an assault on repressive practices which threatens to expand into other forms of direct action.

The Spectacle has so successfully infiltrated Everyday Life that an attack upon the Spectacle appears to be an attack upon Society. When attacked the Spectacle threatens us with the Spectre of Anarchy [...]

We start to dismantle the Spectacle by seizing back from authorities the power to run our own lives. Once again to take control of the organisation of everyday life ourselves [Law, 1993a, 30-1].

Situations may inspire mainstream media coverage, but unlike the stunt, this is the foreseeable result but it is not the main aim.

Amongst the most famous examples of a prank is the Yippies disruption of Wall Street. Abbie Hoffman and other pranksters threw dollar bills into the trading pit, causing the brokers to break off from their work to scramble and fight amongst themselves for the free greenbacks floating down. Dealers brawling over dollars was a dramatic metaphor for the single-minded rapaciousness of the market economy [Orlowski, 1994, 17]. It was an act carried out to be transmitted through the mainstream media. In Britain Class War were at the forefront of attempting to manipulate the mass media to gain attention for anarchist ideas. They initiated pranks that encompassed a multitude of tactics:

Stuntism included the Henley Regatta, the Bash the Rich marches, the Rock Against the Rich tour, the Notting Hill by-election campaign, disruption of CND and Labour Party rallies, the anti-yuppie campaign, the Better Dead than Wed Royals record [Bone, 1997, 9].

The effectiveness of some of the acts Bone describes can only be assessed by the amount of media attentiveness they gain, rather being based on their immediate transformatory and ambient qualities. It is this publicity-seeking feature which is most frequently criticised, and was part of the debate surrounding the split in Class War in 1997.

Bone's stunt methods were regarded as successful as they raised the profile of anarchism in Britain. Home, a critic of Bone and Class War, suggests that stunt tactics had helped make anarchism a 'perceived [...] threat to the British establishment' [Home, 1988, 95]. Yet Bone's stunts were criticised because this media attention also had a down-side, the group eventually becoming reduced to caricatures established by the same institutional processes [Home, 1988, 100]. Even when the tabloids were duped into portraying an image of anarchism which scares the bourgeoisie, it does not measure up to the reality and therefore disappoints those who become interested [N. & Others, 1997, 15]. Rather than confront and subvert the media's power to represent, the stunt too frequently accepts their legitimacy and panders to the imperatives of the multinational communications industry.

The aggrandised image created by stunts reveals the most serious problem with this method i.e. its dependence on the media for its effectiveness.⁷³

Unlike anarchist-produced propaganda, the message has to be mediated through organs and institutions which are hierarchical and a ruling part of the hegemony. The critical role is not played by the subjugated agent, and as such is incompatible with anarchist direct action. For stunts to succeed, all that matters is that the media reports it, thereby using participants instrumentally [Institute for Social Disengineering, 1994, 70]. Dependence on the capitalist media strengthens their power to represent others, fixing radical acts into a repressive social order.⁷⁴

One of the weaknesses of propaganda by deed was that it relied on mainstream media to broadcast the rebel's spectacular message through press reports of the heroic act. Media, however, are integrated into the dominant structures of power carry so either misrepresent or ignore the prefigurative features of anarchist propaganda, turning a synecdochic act into a metaphor. Radical squatting rather than being seen as a form of prefigurative action that challenges property rights is reported in terms of elitist and anti-social behaviour.

The machinations of the media also affect the aim of creating non-hierarchical social relations. The desire for publicity can create a system of leadership and elite roles.

⁷³ See N. & Others, 1997, 14

⁷⁴ 'Journalists [....] are always trying to make you say something that will support whatever angle they have decided to take' [Do or Die, No. 7, 36].

For who's the best person to go and do an interview - the best talker, the most photogenic, the person who did it last time? It's all too easy for the comrade with personal contacts to the media, a way with oratory and previous knowledge to make themselves indispensable. TV people lap it up, it creates individual stars of previously collective movements and make their job of coverage so much easier [Institute of Social Disengineering, 1994, 73].

As a result the authors of Test Card F suggest refusal to co-operate with mainstream media. To engage with the media would be to acquiesce in a hierarchical relationship with a dominant and domineering partner, and to encourage the creation of leadership within the group.

Despite the necessary shortcomings of the stunt, such media-dependent actions have been a prominent feature of more recent anarchist activities. There are two reasons for this development. Firstly there are immediate advantages as it extends the range of audience for anarchist ideas. Most anarchist propaganda, because of financial restraints, runs to just a few thousand copies. More ambitious attempts such as the transitory Committee of Public Safety's⁷⁵ effort to print up and distribute half a million anti-election posters reportedly fell well short [N. & Others, 1997, 15]. Tabloid newspapers, by contrast, are read by millions and reach into areas where there is no anarchist presence. Opening up to the media therefore assists in circulating anarchist ideas, even if it is in a distorted form.⁷⁶

⁷⁶ Class War produced a leaflet arguing against pacifism. The diatribe interested journalists and

The second reason for the continued popularity of stunts is that any event may become subject to the gaze of the non-sympathetic mass media and consequently manipulated. The proposal made in Test Card F that efforts should be made to avoid media representation is impractical [Institute for Social Disengineering, 1994, 76]. The attempt to escape the gaze of the cameras is itself a use of the media. Attacking photo-journalists and subterfuge to avoid representation, tactics favoured by the Institute for Social Disengineering are themselves responses to the media [Institute for Social Disengineering, 1994, 73]. The aim is not to avoid representation, that is impossible, but to limit and control the way in which one is depicted.

There is no clear-cut distinction between stunts performed for the media and situations that maybe reported by them but are not based on creating representation. While prefigurative situations are created which are not directly intended to attract the media, it would be disingenuous to claim that those involved did not alter their behaviour because of the presence of journalists and photographers. J18 activists were well aware that there would be attention from the media. The wearing of carnival masks not only provided a disguise against unfriendly cameras but also a more benign image to viewers than the more traditional balaclavas or bandannas. It is consequently not possible to make absolute distinctions between the non-mediated situation and the stunt. To act as if the media does not exist is unfeasible and possibly dangerous to individual liberty, not least as reporters hand over their footage to the police [Institute of Social Disengineering, 1994, 76]. To ignore the mainstream media is to remain oblivious to sets of interfolding oppressive practices, which constitute part of the material conditions of oppression [Debord, 1983, para 11]. The media is integrated into the state, corporate and military networks. To ignore the media is to disregard hierarchical forms of surveillance and control [Chomsky, 1993; Herman & Chomsky, 1988]. The point is not to neglect the media, but to uncover its oppressive practices and attempt to undermine them. In other words to avoid playing by their rules, and instead act prefiguratively, creating anti-corporate groupings whose internal structures and methods reflect values of equality and reciprocity rather than those of the market place.

Tactics to demonstrate the means by which the media manipulate and misinform can often involve using, through detournement, mass media. These methods are as diverse as 'placing guerrilla ads, doctored billboards, TV jamming, anti-ads and spoof commercials through to full-blown TV slots' in order to show who 'owns the spectacle' and how it operates [Orlowski, 1994, 18]. Stunts are unacceptable when they are not in themselves prefigurative situations, indicative of anti-hierarchical adventure, but act to reinforce the role of the media rather than subverting it. In some instances stunts use participants instrumentally and recreate a bureaucracy of organisers and an elite of spokespeople. Pranks are unacceptable when their criteria for success are those of dominant media practices, such as whether it attracts sufficient attention from corporate news organisations.

To confront distortions, and the integration of anarchism into the established order, it is necessary for anarchists to create their own communicative processes, to uncover the strategies of corporate repression and to challenge them through direct action. Anarchist propaganda, whether through its newspapers, free-sheets, journals, leaflets, stickers, Internet sites and pirate radio provides this role. It also extends into cultural practices such as theatre, film and music. The aim is to create social arrangements that prefigure the multifaceted, multi-identitied characteristics of the anarchist ideal. The social influence of the media is dissipated through the creation of temporary, experimental interventions. The avant-garde artistic movements associated with anarchism break down elitist divisions between audience, creators and subjects especially the privileged position of artists [Porton, 1999, 232].⁷⁷ Anti-representation undermines those procedures that encourage people to transpose their hopes and aspirations onto others. The democratisation of the mass media, by opening up the means of communication to all, requires abandoning distribution on the basis of profit. The result of such assaults involves the creation of new forms of egalitarian expression, which dissolve specialist divisions, such as those between art, reporting and story telling.

Contemporary anarchists' engagement with other oppressed groups and individuals is difficult to determine. An examination of the letters page of Class War, for instance, suggests an overwhelmingly male readership.⁷⁸ British anarchist periodicals do fail to create substantial relationships with other oppressed groupings such as those within the ethnic minorities. This is regrettable but not devastating, as libertarians believe that no publication is pivotal to the struggle, including their own. Some oppressed groups prefer to engage in propaganda through their own magazines or other media. The participatory and egalitarian patterns of communication have successfully avoided creating an anarchist 'star'. Despite the relative fame (or notoriety) of Alice Nutter of Chumbawamba, Ian Bone, Stuart Christie and Martin Wright, none represents, nor seeks to embody, anarchism, in the way Derek Hatton, Ken Livingstone or Tariq Ali have personified the Labour Party Left.

⁷⁸ From Issue No. 50 (1991) to Issue No. 73 (1997)

4. Community Sabotage and Criminality

As discussed earlier the division employed here between communal and workplace action is one employed by activists and theorists rather than one which is compatible with the anarchist ideal. Malatesta and many of the anarchist communists are thought to favour specialist local organisation. Bone, for instance place the greater emphasis on community struggles [Bone, 1997, 9], while Meltzer, Rocker and the anarcho-syndicalists take an opposite view. Yet a blanket preference for one location of action over the others is contrary to the anarchist ideal. It suggests that there are objectively identifiable and totalising oppressive forces that can be superseded only in specific locations. It there were 129 letters published in Class War. The gender of some correspondents cannot be determined as they were signed with initials (DD), under collective group names (Tyneside Anarchist Group) or had gender neutral given names (Maz). Of those in which a reasonable presumption of gender can be assumed, 68 (89%) were by men and 8 (11%) by women (54 were unclassified, one letter being signed by two people).

would accept that the oppressed subjects in these particular sites, or those in a position to distinguish the 'correct' strategic location, constitute the revolutionary vanguard.

The progressive search for surplus value, and the preparation of the workforce for production under modern capitalism means that no institution or activity is free from commercial inspection and interference. As discussed earlier the distinction between workplace and community seems even harder to justify when they can be in the same geographical site.

Conflicts which may appear to start in one location, on closer examination have their origins in resistance in another area and extend into yet more. Bone himself, when discussing the Miners' Strike of 1984-5, refers to the community-based riots, not only in mining areas, but also beyond, that were intended to support a dispute which originated in the workplace. The division of workplace from non-workplace is entirely provisional. The crossover in tactics is apparent in the term 'sabotage' that has its roots in the industrial sector, but it can also be applied to forms of action, which extend beyond the point of immediate production. The search for profit and the imposition of practices based on control of subjugated groups for reasons of financial efficiency extend to locations in addition to the workplace. Consequently sabotage as the means of resisting these disciplines and creating social relationships which are not determined by the dictates of surplus value, occurs in the community as well as in the factory. Such forms of resistance take the form of vandalism, theft, the consumer boycott, squatting and the creation of alternative community relationships.

As social crime theorists such as Linebaugh and E. P. Thompson have indicated, illegality through theft and destruction of property have long been parts of working class protest [Linebaugh, 1993 & Thompson, 1977]. As Marx himself noted the assaults on bourgeois property relations bring about not only stimuli for new products and new modes of production but also produces new laws in which to restrain and subjugate the dispossessed [Marx, 1967, 167-8]. The process of criminalisation is one of the legitimised ways for the state to discipline (potential) miscreants and re-order their structures of domination, through the open use of coercion. Classifying acts as criminal, and thereby fit for punishing, is a response to class conflict. Crime is consequently a category whose embrace is in constant flux depending on the strength of dominant classes and the types of resistance they face. Such a view of crime as having the possibility for anti-hierarchical action is distinct from the characterisation of lawbreaking by Engels. He considered criminality as the lowest form of working class resistance [Engels, 1958, 242-3].

Thompson's concept of the moral economy is useful to the understanding of villainy. Autonomous actions that are the product of values created by the oppressed agent rather than those imposed by heteronomous forces are often in conflict with bourgeois standards. Acts that transgress the values of the dominant class are declared to be criminal. Linebaugh presents examples of the moral economy. The imposition of capitalist priorities on the carriage of goods, emphasising efficiency and maximising profit at the expense of custom, came into conflict with established traditions of docker's taking a sample of all goods they unloaded [Linebaugh, 1993, 162 & 168-173].

There are a number of reasons why anarchism is associated with criminality. Partly it is because of Bakunin's and Nechaev's admiration of banditry, their recognition that constitutional forms are inadequate and that direct action, which is often illegal, is required.⁷⁹ The association is also a result of class-struggle anarchists' recognition of a more expansive, and contingent, definition of 'the working class agent of change'. This multi-form subject, depending on context, can be both worker and criminal. As the reconstruction of capitalism involves deploying different forms of hierarchy, employees too enter into unlawful activities and offenders enter into business arrangements. Sympathetic strike action is now criminalised where before it was officially tolerated. As oppressive practices constantly intersect, so resistance to hierarchy and heteronomous discipline appear in multiple contexts. The structure of drug-dealing gangs often replicates those of mainstream business. There is a small, permanent, highly rewarded elite at the top with a larger group of temporary associates underneath contacted for less well-rewarded riskier tasks. Within the bottom rung a variety of methods are used to reduce the extraction of surplus labour by those at the top. Forms of class struggle can take place within criminal groups and can legitimately be supported by libertarians, whilst they would be ignored by Leninists.

4.1. Vandalism and Hooliganism

Whilst criminality maybe antisocial there is no necessary connection. An antagonistic view of criminality is the caricature of the vandal, an irrationally acting miscreant who craves only self-fulfilment through destruction. The victims are the equally poor (or poorer) near neighbours. Such individuals exist, and their misanthropic behaviour is widely condemned by class-struggle anarchists as it weakens the power of the subjugated class materially and through mutual suspicion erodes networks of social support.⁸⁰

Yet, while certain forms of vandalism are indiscriminate or anti-social, many other forms of direct action (criminalised under this category) are social as they combat heteronomous power. Recent environmental campaigns have used creative vandalism as parts of their activities, whether it is against the ecological risk of genetically modified crops (GMC), or the imposition of new roads on to 'poor people's communities'.⁸¹ The environmental protests identified and publicised a category of vandalism called 'monkey-wrenching' in which mechanical deforestation equipment is disabled using predominantly low-tech methods. 'Monkey-wrenching' covered a multitude of tactical possibilities, breeding other sub-genres. One such sub-category of environmental vandalism is 'pixieing':

⁸⁰ See for instance Class War's 'No muggers' sticker [reprinted in Class War No. 77, 14] and the statement of principles of the ABC.

We will not support:

- Anyone involved in anti-social and oppressive crime, i.e. rape, child abuse, racist attacks, on that basis alone:

- Crime which is anti-working class, eg mugging/burgling other working class people, in short robbing your own [Taking Liberties, No. 19, 1].

Equipment, materials, structures, offices, vehicles, fences and machinery at link road sites were damaged all the time, sometimes by a large crowd who would outnumber security and disappear when the police arrived, but more often by small groups who operated out of view of security [Aufheben, 1998, 108].

In the campaigns against GMC, the direct action has been equally unequivocal, with mass trespasses onto test-sites and the destruction of the crops before they pollinate and potential cross-fertilise with non-GM species. Such action is portrayed by agribusiness as vandalism, but is a form of prefigurative action consistent with the anarchist-ideal.

These activities and the campaigns they are connected to encourage a range of constructive-disruptive tactics. People involved come from a variety of backgrounds and have a range of complex identities. They create links of solidarity across a range of subjugated groups. The anti-M11 link road campaign used creative vandalism and involved a wide variety of groups. Amongst the opponents were local residents whose health was at risk and whose social networks the road would sever. There those who regarded the new highway as an example of rapacious capitalism that had already marginalised them, and groups whose forms of autonomous communal organisation had already been threatened by legislative changes such as the 1994 Criminal Justice Act [Welsh & McLeish, 1996, 36-7]. Vandalism is not the sole tactic, but it provides links for intense communal relations. '[T]he fear and exhilaration born of danger and companionship in the collective obstruction of "progress" [... creates] direct action movements [which] are not easily

4.2. Theft

For classical liberals, who regard the market as a non-coercive mechanism, the right to private property is sacrosanct. Yet, as we have seen, anarchism rejects the abstract notion of contractual obligation, regarding these agreements as coercive (see Chapter II). The anarchist ideal rejects any form of market arrangement which depend on such contractual conventions and their enforcement for its survival.

In the environmental campaigns, as well as in other forms of protest, 'pixied' items are not only destroyed, but are often (re-)appropriated.

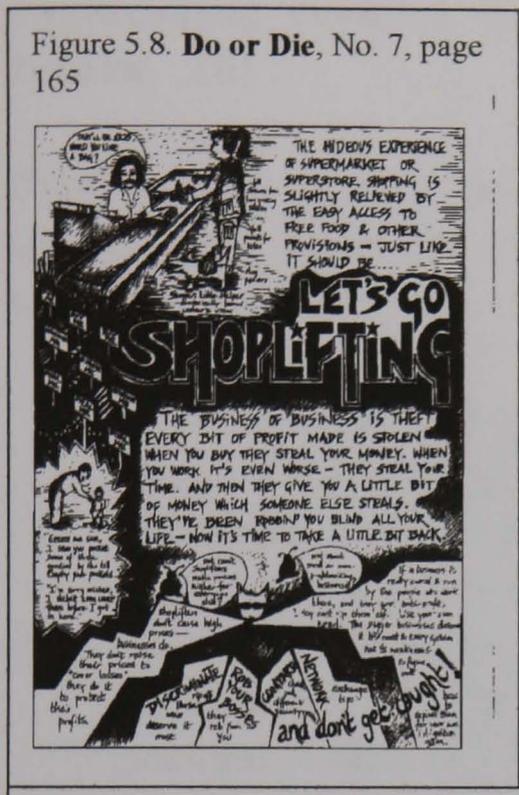

[L]ots of material was stolen from link road sites and other sites in the area. This material was used then used for our purposes - using fencing for barricading, for example. This process had a beautiful roundness and economy about it: turning the enemies' 'weapons' against them! In devalorising these materials from capital's point of view, we revalorised (or autovalorised) them from our own [Aufheben, 1998, 108].

Theft strengthens the agents of change, weakens the practical capacities of oppressive forces and leads to further challenges to larger oppressive forces such as those that support private property rights.

It is not just in recognised campaigns that selective theft is accepted. Mere survival, or experiencing some degree of fulfilment, often requires minor acts of illegality [Attack Attack

Attack Attack, 10]. Shoplifting is a form of resistance that is available to many oppressed subject groups. 'Shop lifting is more accessible than the world of big business: anyone can do it, and many of the people whom big business usually shits on (parents with prams and wheelchair bound, for example) have a positive advantage' [Anarchist Theft No. 1, 1997e, 9] (fig. 5.8.). Such activities strengthen oppressed groups at the expense of subjugating powers and also help to undermine the spectacle of commodification.

As Marx describes in Capital, goods are imbued with false properties through their relationships in commodity exchange. Once disrobed of their price-value, goods are perceived in a new light as Sheffield's Black Star explain:

[B]ecause you gave nothing to get the things you shoplift, merely [merely] owning them means nothing. Shoplifting removes the glamour from goods, it devalues them so that their worth is measured only by how useful they are. And, as the things that you've shop lifted become truly price-less, you see more clearly than ever before. That no amount of books, records, drugs, clothes, food and drink could ever compensate for the misery this society creates [Anarchist Theft, No. 1, 10].

Critics claim that stealing recreates hierarchies, where as the finest thieves, rather than the best entrepreneurs, gain hegemony. Attack International is aware of this risk and indicates that shoplifting should be a part of creating equitable social relationships: 'shoplifting should not become just another individual consuming. We should share out our freebies and help other people (as well as encouraging them to join in)' [Attack Attack Attack Attack, 10].

This is not to say that all acts of theft are legitimate. Targets should be selective, ensuring that those robbed are not from subjugated groups.

We're totally favour in mugging [sic] the rich, shoplifting, burgling posh neighbourhoods, looting, assaulting the police and putting the boot in whenever we can. We're totally opposed to crimes against our own class. Mugging old ladies for a fiver, stealing TV's from council houses - the fuckin' bastards who do this have to be dealt with - and dealt with by local people not the police [Class War, Unnumbered <The Best Cut of All edition>, 6].⁸²

Choosing selectively is a pre-requisite, but the evaluative criteria are not based only on the relative material deprivation of victim and assailant. Burglary reduces the target to the status of a 'victim', who is robbed of autonomy. Responses to anti-social crime, just as to any other oppressive practice must be prefigurative. The victims of the violation should be directing the operation against the transgressor, so as to regain control over their lives [Attack Attack Attack Attack, 15].

⁸² See too the graffiti 'Don't mug me, MUG A YUPPIE!!!, MUG A YUPPIE!!!, in Kenny, 1988e, 17.

Selective theft demonstrates self-valorisation, where subjugated groups determine the distribution and exchange of goods rather than the dominant practice. Berkman describes how anarchist-communism involves creating different forms of distribution based on individual use and collective access rather than financial contract [Berkman, 1987, 68-9]. Distribution through socially concerned theft is prefigurative if the burglary is carried out by an oppressed group, the target has greater social power and the result of the act does not recreate a new hierarchy by harming the victim to such a degree that they have less autonomy than the perpetrators and beneficiaries of the crime. The proceeds should be distributed socially. For instance, land seizures allow for free and equal access.⁸³ When riots and other localised uprisings grow more frequent and increasingly inter-relate, there is an escalation of acts which appropriate the means of production [Class War, 1992, 109-10]

4.3. Boycott

The refusal to handle goods from marked firms and industries has long been a form of industrial action and supported as a selective tactic by anarchists [Miller, 1984, 126]. In the community, the boycott is slightly different, in that the tactical agent is the consumer who refuses to buy particular wares because of some unacceptable features. Boycotts have been run against products of a state-racist country (such as Anti-Apartheid and Anti-Zionist campaigns); or goods manufactured by slave- or prison-labour

(for goods such as Nike and Joe Bloggs); or by a firm that refuses to recognise trade unions (Body Shop) or have a poor environmental record (Shell). The aim is to pressurise the marked firm (or country) by spending money or giving business to competitors.

Anarcho-capitalists, such as Nozick consider the boycott and the concomitant methods of ethical consumption to be consistent with liberal theory. For instance, argues Nozick, if a customer considers workers' control of a business to be of primary importance, this can be incorporated into a free-market society. Customers may be willing to forgo, or boycott cheaper goods from hierarchically managed firms and choose to pay a little more for supporting for the product of self-management [Nozick, 1988, 251-2]. Niche marketeers, such as ethical businesses, explore these possibilities [Kennedy, 1995, 175-6]. The boycott recuperates working class rebellion from the practices and consequences of the existing processes and relations of production and consumption. Capitalists undermine radical assaults by transforming their practices whilst maintaining hegemony. The consumer boycott is one such method, preserving capitalism by reinterpreting discontent into choices between 'ethical' and 'unethical' commodities.

Class-struggle anarchists are critical of the boycott tactic and the class of 'ethical' entrepreneurs. Attack International for instance are hostile to the boycott on the same grounds which Nozick admires, i.e. it does not challenge, and indeed supports, the precepts of free-market capitalism. 'The act of boycotting is an inherent part of consumer choice. Whenever we participate in the consumer market, we exercise our 'right' to boycott by choosing a particular product' [Attack

Attack Attack Attack, 10]. The boycott accepts the legitimacy of the free-market as a suitable vehicle for creating progressive change, a position which is incompatible with anarchism's anti-capitalism. A boycott 'merely transfers the profit margins from one product to another' [Attack Attack Attack Attack 10].

The tactic of the boycott also gives pre-eminence to the wealthier consumer. For a boycott to be successful it becomes more important to influence the buying decisions of the extravagant customer, normally the wealthier, than the poorer buyer whose economic strength is less significant (the boycotts organised by Gandhi may provide a rare exception). The agent for bringing about change is not the oppressed but the benign paternalist. As a result Attack International recommend stealing the offensive product as this hits directly at the profits of the producers. The strength of this argument is that the boycott, in the form described by Attack International, is insufficiently prefigurative and cannot be considered an ideal type anarchist tactic. Nonetheless, there are three important caveats. First, there are occasions where the oppressed group is not the producer but the consumer. In the campaigns against the health risks of various foods (British beef for example), it is the customer who is put at risk. The boycott in these circumstances is not paternalistic, but it does fall foul of other criticisms of the boycott, namely that it places greater emphasis on wealthier consumers and does not undermine capitalism as a mode of production and distribution.

A second caveat is that it is conceivable that liberal practices can be less repressive than other prejudicial ones. The use of boycotts against goods produced in Apartheid South Africa may be such an example. For strategic anarchists, for whom all struggles are reducible to anti-capitalism, such an argument does not hold. For contemporary anarchists who recognise a multitude of oppressive practices, not all of which are wholly reducible to capitalism, it is possible that a boycott regime that successfully rewarded a liberal exploiter at the expense of an authoritarian one would be considered legitimate. Yet, even here, as capitalist relations increasingly extend and dominate all contexts, such occasions are increasingly rare.

The most important caveat is that not all boycotts are a matter of choosing commodity X from commodity Y. An alternative may be a non-market relationship. In the Montgomery bus boycott of 1955-6, the black citizenry who were the victims of the transport authority's prejudice rebelled against discrimination and abandoned the segregated public system although no alternative was available. This latter type of acceptable boycott is akin to strikes in the industrial sector. When students boycott school lessons or lectures there is no market mediation, so Attack International's legitimate criticism of consumer led embargoes does not apply. Nor would it apply to rent boycotts that aim to hurt the owners of unearned income and do not assist another landlord. These actions remain anti-market tactics rather than arrangements in selective consumption. As a participant in the Glasgow rent boycott of 1915 points out in her account, the boycott joined up with other working class tactics and organisations, such as anti-war and industrial protest. It also gave opportunities for women to play a dominant role in radical action [Crawford, 1991, 4-5]. Greater diversity of tactics inspires a larger set of agents and creates more complex links of solidarity.

4.4. Squatting

Squatting is a form of rent boycott that has been associated with anarchism since the 1960s, as it demonstrates the main themes of libertarian direct action. The method intends to resolve the problem of homelessness and as such is synecdochic of the wider vision of anarchism, while the persons affected are those involved in the process of resolution. Squatting frequently leads on to other forms of class struggle so it is not merely an end in itself.

In 1968 the London Squatters Campaign was formed. The founding members came from New Left backgrounds, either anarchist and libertarian-socialist groupings or the International Socialists (a forerunner of the SWP). Although its first activity was largely symbolic, a brief demonstration outside the Hollies, a luxury private housing development in Essex, it began to move into practical direct action, assisting homeless families in taking over empty properties in the Redbridge suburb. Those directly affected by the failure of the paternalistic state and the market in housing took action to resolve their situation. The actions of the squatters won substantial support from the local community [Bailey, 1973, 105].

The London squatters gained substantial press coverage because of their resolve in dealing with the legal and extra-legal measures taken by the council and bailiffs. Squatting campaigns flourished throughout London, Nottingham, Birmingham and Glasgow as homeless and inadequately housed individuals, families and friendship groups discovered empty properties to re-appropriate. Others who resented paying large percentages of their income to landlords and those who found the

The squatters' targets were the symbols of the failure of capitalism to fulfil its consumer promises. Centrepoint, a vacant London office block, was squatted in 1974 as well as Biba Boutique, a former target of the Angry Brigade [Wates & Wolmar, 1980, 36 & 45]. Squatting subverted the intended meanings of these buildings and their place in the geography of capitalism. Offices became communal homes for the dispossessed and residential properties were transformed into workshops and community centres. The tactic of appropriating land remains one of the most immediate tactics for class struggle anarchists, as it also develops and interacts into other forms of action.

The difference between reformist and radical squatters was based on whether the expropriation of space the ultimate objective. Within the Redbridge squatting movement, there were two distinct camps. The first personified by Ron Bailey saw squatting and the reform of the housing system as the aim, the other regarded squatting as a base for other forms of struggle [Bailey, 1973, 102 & Broad, 1978]. Bailey accused his 'anarchist' opponents of using squatting instrumentally. Chris Broad countered the allegation. He considered squatting as an action that encouraged other tactics through example. Squatters' themselves tried to extend liberatory social relations. Robert Goodman in After the Planners also distinguishes between reformist and 'guerrilla' architects. The latter, like anarchist squatters, believe that the 'successes and even failures [of their actions] lead to the kind of political consciousness which in turn leads to further political acts and the creation of a larger movement' [Goodman, 1972, 228]. Challenging civil law and acting directly boosts confidence and encourages ever more radical possibilities.⁸⁵

Even reformist squatters challenge the inviolability of private property rights, and aim to formulate distribution in terms of use and social need. As a result squatters stress that it is a prerequisite that empty properties are appropriated rather than those already inhabited by others [Advisory Service for Squatters, 1996, 6]. Yet, squatters like Bailey sought only to ameliorate property relations, ignoring other oppressive social practices that are linked to the capitalist determination of ownership and control. By cauterising possible links of solidarity, reformist squatters embrace free-market relations rather than opposing them.

Squatting has been used for entrepreneurial advantage providing cheap rent to create new markets and supply novel goods. Squats have housed vegan cafes, creators of primitive jewellery, whole food suppliers and 'alternative' music shops representing particular class interests assisting in the gentrification of working class areas [Wates & Wolmar, 1980, 42-3 & Reilly, 1990e, 8]. The guerrilla squatters, by contrast, sought to extend the conflict with oppressive powers. Speculation was identified as a cause for homelessness. Campaigns were launched against housing entrepreneurs, such as the estate agents Prebble & Co. in Islington [Wates & Wolmar, 1980, 33]. Brixton squatters opposed the gentrification of the part of South London which saw the introduction of repressive byelaws as well as council action against undesirables. Earlier squatters from the same area had participated in the riots of 1985, fortifying links with other local oppressed groups [Crowbar No. 45, 4-7]. In the environmental campaigns against the Newbury bypass, in Pollock against the M77 (1994-5), and in 1994 at Claremont Road against the M11 link road, less than two miles from the original Redbridge campaign, squatting was itself used as a barrier against the highway developments. The physical possession of space through the occupation of buildings and trees (as well as using legal, constitutional manoeuvres in order to slow down clearances) not only impeded the contractors, but helped to create communities of mutual support. Ali Begbie, an activist in Pollock, describes their protest as not only disrupting environmentally destructive construction but creating 'a place of beauty and hope where energy is directed from the heart towards respecting the earth and each other' [Begbie, 1996, 71].

The Pollock Squatters tried to breakdown the separation between themselves and other local residents in order to avoid elitism and to find avenues of effective solidarity [see Chapter Four, especially 5.2.). In an effort to counteract this separation of roles and the fixing of oppositional identities, contemporary anarchist squatters not only reject a vanguard approach but also intend many of the squatted properties to have a wider community use. Appropriated buildings such as the Autonomous Centre in Edinburgh or the Brighton Courthouse squat are used by community groups and for local bands to have gigs, which also share in the control of the space [Angela, 1996 76 & McKay, 1996, 175].⁸⁶

non-participants to be at the expense of personal privacy and dignity. Such experiments offer a chance to develop wider, prefigurative social arrangements within the squatting group and beyond. The buildings and structures often reflect this diversity, including temporary partitions, communal sleeping dormitories, and rooms with multiple transient uses [Wates & Wolmar, 1980, 175]. Squatting is a useful multiple tactic. It conforms to the pattern of anarchist direct action. The prefigurative response to specific repressive conditions does not engage only the squatters themselves but also assists new modes of protest.

4.5. Communes

Some communes are merely a synonym for more general squats but another interpretation sees them as close to ghettos. The latter version aims to create a liberated society, complete in itself, within capitalism, providing opportunities for experimentation in social-relations and forms of production. Examples include the Whiteway colony to which the survivors from the original Freedom retired in the 1930s and the Crabapple community whose aims are suitably prefigurative: to create a mini-society which is co-operative and consensual and which eradicates the sexist division of labour and other forms of hierarchy [Merseyside Anarchist No. 28, 18]. Creating new communities has been a tactic advanced by a variety of political ideologues as well as by an assortment of anarchists.⁸⁷

⁸⁷ Fourier, Saint-Simon and Owen also considered the possibility of building new societies in the body of the existing order. It can also be found in versions of fascism. The Aryan Nations and anti-federal state militia in the USA have set up compounds based on the precepts of their own ideologies.

Communes are however subject to considerable criticism from class-struggle anarchists on three grounds. First, they are often elitist, open only to those with sufficient wealth or desirable skills. Second, for all its anti-hierarchical motivations, their relationships with non-commune members as well as internally fail to live up to their egalitarian principles. Finally, in building and sustaining the commune they are too acquiescent towards capitalism and neglect other avenues of solidarity with oppressed groups.

Fourier famously targeted the wealthy to support his phalanxes, while an article in Green Anarchist proposes building a 'primitivist community in Zimbabwe or Mozambique for US$66,000' [Green Anarchist, No. 39, Autumn 1995, 24].⁸⁸ This proposal not only raises questions about which individuals are in a position to leave family, friends and other responsibilities and afford their share of the initial set-up fee plus the substantial transport to the commune, but begs the questions from whom are they buying the land (and who gave them the right to sell it)?⁸⁹ And what sorts of relationship will these Western incomers have with the African authorities and especially the citizenry? It would seem that the proposers of the commune are aiming their publicity at a Western, independent, relatively wealthy, elite.

In keeping with their anti-hierarchical views communes often desire free admittance, but those with such an open policy frequently fail. John Vidal and George Monibot describe in their accounts of the Pure Genius encampment in Wandsworth set up in 1996 the problems of communes based on uninhibited access. Vidal describes how the free site attracted the victims of the Conservative government mental health reforms. Individuals with severe psychiatric problems, without adequate social support, and having few other avenues, drifted towards the site.

[U]topians and protestors had no training in dealing with the mentally disturbed, beyond common sense and sympathy (of which there was a lot). "How do you deal with people on heroin? People with guns and knives? We have no support network. Some of these people need hospital care, many needed professional help" [The Guardian Section 2, 16.10.96, 3].

Monibot elucidates:

[T]he tragedy of open access [... is] that where there are no constraints on exploitation everyone who makes use of a resource will overexploit it, as the gain accrues only to himself [sic], while the loss is shared by the whole population. Resources used in this way inevitably will be eroded until they disappear.

In Wandsworth, the resources in question were not land, which on the whole was well-tended but the more ethereal commodities of peace and good-will [The Guardian Section 2, 16.10.96, 2-3].

Monibot concludes that experimental communities should be built only on common interests which positively exclude those whose concerns do not coincide with those already determined [The Guardian

Section 2, 16.10.96, 3]. For a commune to persist it must in some ways recreate capitalist divisions, between those who are deemed an asset and those who are a liability, the latter are excluded. Bey and ideal type anarchists propose more transitory and multiple modes of protest in order avoid fixing such discriminatory identities.

Communes are often geared towards escape, a refuge from repressive social structures. Other proponents of a radical commune writing for supporters in Green Anarchist describe their aim as to 'swim sideways out' of capitalism [Green Anarchist No. 38, Summer 1995, 20]. As critics point out social relations still influence even a solitary individual's reality [Marx, 1967, 110]. Communes do provide useful prefigurative moments, but as a class-struggle visitor of Crabapple describes, they do so inadequately. 'I found the community lacked a political angle as it was not challenging the state although it was tackling related issues - junk food, consumer culture, animal welfare' [Merseyside Anarchist No. 26, April 1991, 12]. By ignoring other forms of action and concentrating only on the commune, social roles and identities became fixed. Identities of commune members (defined against those excluded) become reified and that leads to the reconstruction of hierarchical practices. Other communes, which do not impose a rigid division between their 'perfect' community and the rest of the world, are similar to the guerrilla squats and hence avoid such elitist separation.

5. Atypical Anarchist Tactics

Anarchist tactics depend on context and agency. As seen with categories of action such as propaganda by deed or industrial sabotage, these terms cover a multiplicity of methods whose consistency with the prefigurative ethic depends on the subject identities and the particularities of the specific location. Generalised approval or disapproval of classes of (anti-)political behaviour is indicative of a quasi-scientific approach that permits an elite vanguard outside of these contexts to make this decision and dictate action. As a result, even acts that appear to conform to categories of behaviour normally accepted as being incompatible with the prefigurative archetype, on occasions can be legitimate.

In Chapter II certain classes of social action, such as constitutional activity, were assessed as irreconcilable anarchism as they involve mediation. Other forms of radical behaviour such as encouraging capitalism and conformity appear to be utterly inimitable. Nonetheless libertarians have propounded these methods because of their apparent anti-elitist forms. These manoeuvres deserve closer examination. Even when, bar a tiny minority of occasions, they are irreconcilable with the prefigurative ethic, they illustrate the continual attempt to innovate, and the tensions in trying to create effective tactics whilst avoiding the problems associated with consequentialism.

5.1. Constitutional Activity

Opposition to representative democracy has been part of British anarchism since the late nineteenth century. Der Arbiter Frait split from Der Polische Yidl on the basis of the latter's support for a parliamentary candidate. Yet there have been rare incidents of anarchists participating in elections. In Australia, where voting is compulsory, anarchists have stood as candidates to provide their supporters with an opportunity to avoid prosecution as well as to mock the electoral process.⁹⁰ In Britain in 1988 Class War stood a candidate in the Kensington by-election and writers for the anarchist influenced Alarm were candidates in the 1979 Swansea Council elections [Solidarity No. 13, Winter 1986-87, 11-2].

Anarchists' reject constitutional means, yet their involvement in elections does not take the form of that prescribed by anti-market socialist groups such as the SPGB. The SPGB rejected all other forms of struggle in favour of parliamentary methods, considering the democratic mandate as necessary and sufficient for revolutionary change [Coleman, 1987, 93 & SPGB, 1993, 22]. Other socialist groups such as the Socialist Party claim to use parliamentary politics much more tactically, as opposed to the SPGB's strategic response, however in practice, as Trotwatch describe the result is often similar. As they attempt to participate in the electoral process even independently or through active support of the Labour Party Leninist groups take curiously contradictory stances [Trotwatch, 1992].

Class War's intervention into constitutional politics is distinct from the SPGB. Class War's intervention into the political process is provisional, approach to liberation, as Tim Palmer of Class War explains:

[W]e haven't suddenly come to the blinding realisation that there is a parliamentary road to anarchism, socialism or whatever, or even having Class War's MP wandering the corridors

of Westminster would be in any way a particularly good thing - all the way through the 'campaign' we always stated in no uncertain terms exactly what we thought of the parliamentary system [Palmer, 1988e, 2]

Class War used the opportunity to attack parliamentary activity in a similar way to that of the anti-elections campaigns, but 'by getting in the thick of it [...] people actually heard it for once' [Palmer, 1988e, 2].

This tactic was classified by Bone as a stunt, as it relied on the media for its effectiveness [Bone, 1997, 9]. It was successful as stories appeared in the national newspapers, yet as a stunt it could not be repeated too often: 'things are never as good the second time around [...] but as a tactic we hope it played a part' [Palmer, 1988e, 2]. With the multiplicity of fringe parties the opportunities for a CWF candidate to gain attention is restricted. Intervention into politics is a qualified tactic designed to undermine through subversion rather than to reaffirm the legitimacy of constitutional authority.

There are still problems with Class War's electoral stunt, including its dependence on the established media that has already been discussed. However, the reliance on constitutional methods does reaffirm them as the method through which protest can operate. For all of Class War's attempts to condemn parliamentary activity and to advocate working class self-activity instead, the medium remains that of constitutional politics. With no chance of winning, the criticisms of electoral methods and the heteronomous power they legitimise, might be read by the non-anarchist (the agent Class War was aiming to reach) as the cries of a sore loser. Participation in the Westminster system reaffirms Parliament's liberality in allowing oppositional voices to stand. Furthermore, rather than encouraging action, the agent remains the passive voter, looking on at Class War's subversive intervention. Additionally, the cost in terms of time and effort, for relatively little lasting publicity and even fewer votes (60) might suggest that other tactics might be more appropriate.⁹¹

The SPGB's criticism of anarchism remains that without the democratic mandate provided by the electoral system, anarchist actions are elitist and paternalist as they do not have the agreement of the people [Challinor, 1977, 44 & Coleman, 1987, 92-4]. But this is to misunderstand communism. For class struggle libertarians, liberation is not the imposition of a set of absolute, scientifically determined rules (whether with or without democratic agreement) but the struggles of the oppressed subjects themselves in defetishizing the social conditions of capitalism [Aufheben No. 4, Summer 1995, 3]. Consequently the methods have to be prefigurative. The use of constitutional means, if it reaffirms representative democracy, would not be synecdochic of non-hierarchical social structures.

5.2. Over-Production

Jean Baudrillard's post-structuralist tactics is also motivated by avoidance of vanguard actions. It is not the intention here to give a comprehensive account of Baudrillard's postmodernism, nor to trace his development from ultra-leftism with links to the SI to the alluring pessimistic nihilism of his more recent writings,⁹² but to concentrate on the features of his work which posit a different tactic. Baudrillard engages in sketching the contours of phenomena that will bring about a new society without providing new forms of domination.

Marxism since Lukacs has been concerned with reification and the decline of subjectivity, as people are increasingly treated as objects and become enthralled by commodities, in particular to the hierarchies of status ascribed to these goods and services. Radical proposals from libertarians such as the Situationists sought to reawaken the subjective desires of the oppressed, whilst Baudrillard instead proposes the fatal strategy of embracing objectification and giving up the illusion of subjectivity. Objects, according to Baudrillard pursue trajectories of going to extremes, like 'cells in cancer' [Best & Kellner, 1991, 131]. Pushing the logic of capitalism to its extreme would cause a crisis leading to its transformation. Consequently Baudrillard promotes consumerism as a means of forcing capitalism into collapse where debts do not have to be paid ('amortization'). He proposes form of deficit spending without the hangover of repayment or the consequences of bankruptcy:

[A] system is abolished only by pushing it into hyperlogic, by forcing it into an excessive practice which is equivalent to a brutal amortization. "You want us to consume - O.K., let's consume always more, and anything whatsoever; for any useless and absurd purpose" [Baudrillard, 1983, 46].

The avowedly anarchist Decadent Action follow Baudrillard in arguing that capitalism can best be forced into a fatal crisis by stimulating it further. Through encouraging the desire for goods that the economic system is unable to meet it will reach a critical point. Decadent Action demand greater and better commodities and embrace the benefits of further consumption. 'Abstaining from the trappings of capitalism won't make it go away. But if it is fed to excess it will burst' [Q. Decadent Action, Scotland on Sunday, 31.8.97, 9].

The development of capitalism as productive forces extend certainly brings about traumatic changes in social relations. The restructuring of the British economy such that market mechanisms were given ever freer reign by successive Thatcher governments unleashed a mass of chaotic drives. Yet, as Best & Kellner point out, such a strategy of encouraging grander oppressive forces (capitalism) in itself 'hardly caused capital any hardships and obviously [... was] not going to subvert or transform the system and by the 1980s Baudrillard gave up postulating any specific goals or political projects' [Best & Kellner, 1991, 131]. It was the countervailing forms of resistance and self-valorization that were a threat to dominating power, not the extension of market relationships. Baudrillard's method of over-production is rejected by class struggle anarchists not just because it is unsuccessful, but it also reifies existing practices and makes historically specific practices of late capitalism appear totalising and universal.

Decadent Action's fashionable anarchism bears remarkable similarities to Leninism.⁹³ For this group, it is capitalism that is determinant, whereas the actions of the oppressed are secondary. Decadent Action share with the Lenin the view that the forces of production must be developed until a point of crisis is reached, prioritising a distinct class of people as those most capable of bringing about liberation, those in the most advanced capitalist countries. The methods proposed by Decadent Action are not only incompatible with the prefigurative ideal which rejects vanguardism but is inconsistent with their industrial campaign of sabotage through absenteeism ('phone-in sick') which is largely consistent with ideal forms of anarchism.

5.3. Hyper-Passivity and Disengagement

Baudrillard considers that the situationist notion of the spectacle is problematic as it posits a set of real meanings that capitalism has overturned, and to which the revolutionaries aim to return. Yet such essentialism evident in the situationist search for authenticity does not apply to the post-structuralist anarchisms developed here. For Baudrillard there is no reality below the surface. In a world of ever-expanding production, of greater and greater media of communication and expansion of signs, simulation becomes more real than reality. The same grammar for advertising and entertainment enters that of politics and art [Baudrillard, 1987, 19-20]. Not only do soap-opera villains require bodyguards, but also presenters on real-crime programmes, where villainy is reproduced to entertain and assist the police, become victims of murderous crime themselves (more than likely as a result of their media role). The assassination of the TV personality is then recreated on the same police assistance programme that thrust them into public prominence. Hyperreality blurs the distinction between the real and unreal. Intervention only increases the production of signs whilst also promoting an authoritarian notion of authenticity.

A result of the explosion of signs, and ever increasing bombardment of messages exhorting the masses to act, react, consume, produce, vote and opine, is that the rabble refuse and become in Best & Kellner's words 'a sullen, silent majority' [Best & Kellner, 1991, 121]. '[T]he masses scandalously resist this imperative of rational communication. They are given meaning: they want spectacle' [Baudrillard, 1983, 10]. The masses chose watching football over participating in protest and this shocks the radicals who demand that the working class reacts in an appropriate manner, or at least appears to care [Baudrillard, 1983, 12-3]. The masses for Baudrillard resist the authoritarianism of imposed meanings by rejecting engagement. Through apathy, the masses resist developing the process of creative dissent that is used to further spectacular production. According to Plant there are similarities between Baudrillard's method of total disengagement and Stewart Home's 'Art Strike' advanced in his Art Strike propaganda and in the situationist-inspired Here and Now [Plant, 1990, vi-vii]. By refusing to engage in critical art, the artist resists the creation of artefacts for galleries, museums and dealers [Home, 1990, v].⁹⁴

Ideal type anarchism, which as Chapter II describes engages with post-structuralism. It rejects the metaphysics of claims to knowing or believing in a human essence and is not predicated on objective, primary, or authentic relationships. Green Anarchism, liberal forms of anarchism and much of the classical anarchist canon was based on notions of 'authenticity' and 'naturalness' between subjects and subjects or between subjects and 'nature'. Post-structural anarchism nonetheless recognises that the present symbolic order is not indispensable, that it can be replaced with different systems, as a result it is in conflict with Baudrillard's and the Art Strikers' tactic of disengagement. Passivity of this form celebrates quiescence (and even death).⁹⁵ The art strike's inactivity may like Baudrillard's hyperpassivity, argues Plant, leave nothing for capitalism to recuperate but it also disarms opposition [Plant, 1990, vii].

By ignoring the subjectivities of 'the masses', reducing them to a single identity, Baudrillard fails to recognise that even in watching sport the opportunity for subversion occurs and is grasped. Baudrillard argues that the spectacle of televised sport, like the artwork deposited in a museum for mass consumption, represents a flight from engagement [Baudrillard, 1983, 37-8]. Yet viewing television need not be a wholly passive recreation. Watching a match on the big screen at a pub can involve a myriad of social behaviours; meeting friends, conversing, conspiring, celebrating and commiserating. Although the locations for mass spectating has moved from the direct arena of the pitch and the stadium to the mediated environment of the brewery-sponsored giant television, new forms of social disruption have arisen. The theft of signal from pay-TV is commonplace. The over-policing and mass-surveillance of the football ground have long prevented the development of an environment for congregation and conflict. Technological advance and capitalist restructuring of sport has dispersed the mass spectating environment into multiple locations. Disorder is no longer situated in one site, the football stadium and its immediate environs. England's defeat in the 1998 World Cup saw riots take place throughout that country, while Newcastle town centre witnessed substantial anti-police disorder following their team's defeat in the FA Cup final in 1999, although Wembley, where the game was played, was unaffected.

6. Summation

Contemporary anarchism embraces a diversity of tactics and agents, with none taking universal precedence. In the past such multiplicity was considered to be confused or chaotic, yet polymorphous tactics are appropriate to the diversity and complexity of different oppressive practices. Thieves, vandals and saboteurs are not an underclass of naive rebels but are some of the identities imposed on and assumed by those engaged in struggle. Multiform agents can form part of a wider coalition of creative liberation.

There are no universally appropriate strategies, nor organisational forms. Some tactics are only suitable within certain contexts aimed at particular forms of oppressive force and carried out by specific agents. When they meet constraints, such as the commodification of roles or integration of opposition into the dominant order, new identities form and corresponding methods and organisational forms emerge. Reactions and responses to repressive practices cannot be determined from an objective position, as no such location exists, nor can the precise forms or identities of solidarity be prescribed. For anarchists, however, certain forms of organisation and particular groupings will be ruled out as their intervention would be paternalistic and their methods antipathetic to their prefigurative ambitions.

The divisions between community and workplace tactics have come to end. Some networks and organisations, by the nature of the subjects, will concentrate on issues at the workplace and develop methods to overcome bureaucratic rule. In other contexts distinct oppositional networks will form and can contain the same agents in different organisations using disparate methods. Each victory creates a modification of the strategy of control by the dominant class. The miners' victories in the early 1970s resulted in new procedures in policing to destroy industrial tactics. Autonomous workers groups found imaginative means of countering the mass policing of workplace hot spots, such as hit squads and spontaneous road blocks, until the union sought to maintain their leading role in the control of the dispute and keep it within traditional, containable methods.

Innovative types of organisation encourage imaginative tactics and produce new subject identities. The anti-roads protests created new networks such as the squatting communities. The criminalisation of their actions and policing of their protests lead them to take on strong, mutually supportive (almost tribal) groupings and as such they celebrated the primitive. Tactics develop in response to ever-altering circumstances and encourage resourceful forms of solidarity. For contemporary class struggle anarchists the revolution is not a singular event that heralds immediate new social relations, but is the culmination of extending creative, collaborative social relations. The brave, magnificent experiments in living which transform everyday life, are both the means and the end.

Conclusion

Conclusion

'Resistance is fertile' [Slogan of Mayday 2000].

Figure 6.1. Statue of Churchill 1.5.00

For the third time in less than twelve months, anarchism is the subject of enormous media interest.¹ Invective screams from the front pages of national newspapers following the anti-capitalist demonstration in London on Monday May 1st, 2000. All the major newspapers lead with denunciations of the day's events. 'Riot yobs desecrate Churchill Monument', 'This was their vilest hour', 'MAY DAY MAYHEM' [The Sun, 2.5.2000, 1; The Mirror, 2.5.00, 1; The Daily Express, 2.5.2000, 1]. Once again anarchism is conflated with irrational violence resulting in groups facing greater state and quasi-state investigation.²

Mayday 2000 was a weekend of activities based on the theme of 'anti-capitalism'. It was loosely coordinated by a network comprising many of the groups that are the subject of this thesis including AF, EF!, Class War, MA'M, RTS and SolFed. The operational core was an assembly based at the Resource Centre on Holloway Road in North London. Talks ranged from practical advice on direct action and de-schooling to highly theoretical exchanges on situationist theory, the challenge of globalisation and debates between Trotskyist and autonomist interpretations of marxism.³ The ambitious programme of events concluded with an RTS-inspired 'guerrilla gardening' project. Parliament

Square opposite the British legislature was replanted with bushes, flowers and shrubs. The torn up turf carpeted the roads. To the horror of the Daily Mail, the statue of Churchill was redecorated with a grass mohican [Daily Mail, 2.5.2000, 1].

Quoting an unnamed source The Guardian gives an indication of the size of the threat anarchists are supposed to present. 'Millennium eve apart [...] the police operation to deal with the demonstration was "the biggest in 30 years"' [The Guardian, 20.4.00, 13]. The high level reaction was so intense it often seemed absurd. An educational walking tour examining the anarchist history of the East End, arranged for the Friday night on the eve of the conference, was attended by 50 participants but was met by five mini-vans of riot police. Those entering the Resource Centre were video-taped, and a special surveillance unit recorded anyone leaving the nearby tube station. The intrusion of the state and the preceding hysterical press coverage impeded the very spontaneity that had marked events such as J18.⁴

Following the guerrilla gardening the impromptu march up Whitehall to Trafalgar Square led to the all too predictable attack on McDonalds. The ensuing mini-riot was little more than a show case for the police to use well practised crowd control and harassment techniques. Unlike J18, when the destruction was predominantly discerning and a useful addition to the diverse alliances and creative propaganda, the forms of contestation at the Mayday 2000 had become formulaic. Activist roles had been frozen into a symbolic order that was easy to manipulate by the police and media. Targets, such as the graffiti on the cenotaph or Churchill were represented as assaults on the anti-fascist dead.⁵ The vengeful Metropolitan police easily outnumbered the 2000 protestors they interned in Trafalgar Square for four hours. Likely suspects were picked out, individually photographed, questioned and humiliated. 97 have been arrested.⁶ J18 had been an exercise in extending autonomy and participation. Mayday, by contrast, was tainted by frustrating paralysis.

Reactions to anarchism have been as complex and provisional as the liberation movements they try to restrain. The class struggle anarchism of over a century ago faced religious and press investigation of its clubs. Political interventions included legal restrictions on immigration [Fishman, 1975, 117-118, 215]. The first chapter not only traced the development of the formal anarchist groups in Britain but also responses to them. Legislative assaults are a feature of more recent times. Margaret Thatcher in the 1980s criminalised many industrial tactics, the Major government introduced the 1994 Criminal Justice Act that prohibited rave culture and the Labour government's is proposing a new Prevention of Terrorism Act that targets direct action organisations. Counter-measures provoke new subjugating groups and are one of the impulses for innovative emancipatory manoeuvres.

The framework of evaluation, the subject of the second chapter, was constructed from portions of contemporary anarchist texts that critique the tactics of competing movements and those fragments that appraise their methods. An ideal type of anarchism is created by which to assess the actual techniques of contemporary groups. The ideal is not a fixed archetype, but a collection of principles whose manifestations to change according to localised circumstances. The multitudes of, and transformations in, libertarian tactics, nevertheless share key characteristics. These particular traits are commitments to non-hierarchical participation by those directly oppressed. The identities of the agents of change, discussed in chapter three, demonstrated that liberation requires that the primary agents of change were those in subjugated positions. In different contexts a distinctive oppressed subject appears, in the 19th Century East End of London these would be the Jewish immigrant sweatshop employees, in the same geographical area in the 21st Century a different subjugated agent appears. Different contexts have distinct agents with no single oppressed group taking universal priority. Oppression is irreducible to a singular source, although for contemporary anarchists, economic oppression is often (although not always) primary in the locations in which they operate.

Many contemporary libertarians explicitly identify the prefigurative, anti-hierarchical and participatory characteristics as key features of their organisational and tactical praxis (chapters four and five), even though their critics do not. The multiplicity and impermanence associated with contemporary anarchism means that libertarian trends share similarities with politically engaged post-structuralisms. Nonetheless some contemporary class struggle anarchists share their critics' confusion surrounding methods and tactics. Consequentialist approaches still abound; the long shadow of the grand modernist designs still obscure the more elaborate and temporary textures of the contemporary radical movement. Bewilderment, however, is more evident amongst those whose purpose is to control libertarian action than those who are involved.

In analysing anarchist tactics one area of analysis is that concerning propaganda by word. This raises the questions of where is this thesis located? What are its aims, and what relationship does it play to the prefigurative criteria it uses to assess anarchist tactics? There are a number of misgivings that are legitimate concerning research projects such as this.

No analysis, especially those on the self-creativity of oppressed groups, can claim to be objective. Specific prominent events provoke partisan emotions. Additionally my selection of materials and choice of incidents is influenced by my (tenuous) position within an elite institution (a university), as well as my social and cultural background, just as the social position of the reader is affect her/his interpretation of this text. The decision to dedicate time and resources to this project already implies a pre-existing attraction to the subject. There is also a contrary tendency in which prolonged proximity leads to frustration and disenchantment. The aim, nevertheless, has been to provide a convincing, documented account of contemporary anarchism and to critically evaluate its tactical and organisational forms through an appropriate framework. In carrying out these tasks movements have been classified under various categories such as 'anarchist communist', 'syndicalist', 'autonomist', 'workplace' and 'environmentalist'. These, often provisional, divisions are especially problematic for movements that aim to break through the reifying restraints of categorisation.

The accumulation and collating rebellious social movements is often a precursor to their control. Codifying material carries the risk of assisting those bodies that police and discipline revolt. A danger that is aggravated by the types of elite distribution and access associated with academic theses. Beyond the steps taken to provide interested individuals from relevant anarchist groups an opportunity to review the enterprise prior to submission, there is little that can be done without a radical reform of the university and the forms of economy that it enhances. Hierarchies in exchange of information are not only restricted to texts produced from within the academy.

The fluidity that characterises contemporary anarchism makes analysis of their groups and alliances particularly problematic. Anarchist associations are as complex as relationships themselves. Just as no one can impose camaraderie, or predict in advance how deep or how long lasting a friendship will be, so too no one can externally will the forms of solidarity between subjugated groups. In the same way that liaisons can become romances, life-long partnerships or transitory but intense affairs, so too the groups and collaborations can be continuous, occasional or temporary dependant on context. This research has concentrated on texts or semi-prominent activities, as a result it has tended to concentrate on those groups that achieve(d) a degree of permanence. The consequence of concentration on the more constant organisations is that there is the risk that a deceptive impression of anarchism is created. One that implies greater solidity, or that intimates that the formal groups are the sole vehicles for libertarian action. This potentially misleading perception of libertarianism would be stronger if the reader's attention is not drawn to the considerable degree of change that takes place within these apparently stable groups. The Black Flag, Class War, EF! or SolFed of five years ago (never mind ten or 15 years ago in the case of the first two) are considerably different from that operating after the turn of the millennia. The successes of the Poll Tax campaign, environmental campaigns and J18 each provided new stimuli for change within and across groups. So too the failures of the miners' and printers industrial actions, or more modestly the shortcomings of Mayday 2000 provokes new adaptations. The vibrancy of liberatory movements depends on their abilities to respond inventively to constraints as well as new freedoms they, in part, helped to create. The strengths and weakness of anarchism can be assessed by how quickly they adjust and to the degree to which these new tactics correspond to the prefigurative ethic.

Bibliography

Guide To Footnotes & Bibliography

In many source materials there is no publication date. In these cases, an estimated date of publication has been given in followed by 'e'. Also, many pieces do not contain pagination. In these cases, to help enable efficient checking of sources, page numbers have been given with the front cover counting as page 1. Pseudonyms have only been matched with the authors, either with permission, or when the matter has already been published or otherwise publicly known, such as in an open meeting.

In primary source material, where an author has been given, then the bibliography records the article under that author. Where the article is unsigned, it is credited to the group producing the journal. If the article is anonymous, it is classified under the group publishing it, and where no publisher is recorded, the article is classified under its title. Books are underlined, pamphlets under 46 pages and magazines are in bold and newspapers are listed in italics.

Due to the localised nature of the productions, national library catalogues are unlikely to contain some of these materials. Highly recommended sources include the Kate Sharpley Library (contact at BM Hurricane, London, WC1 3XX). Copies of many of the cited materials may be found through AK Distribution, A Distribution, Compendium, Freedom Press, Housemans and Porcupine Bookshops in London. In many cases, but regrettably not all, copies of sources cited in the bibliography are available from the compiler of this bibliography. I am grateful to Mike Craven, Adenike Johnson, David Lamb, Bill Whitehead, Millie Wild and Rowan Wilson for allowing me access to their archives.
