Safeguarding people with learning disabilities from forced marriage: the role of Safeguarding Adult Boards

<table> <thead>
<tr>
<th>Journal:</th>
<th>The Journal of Adult Protection</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Manuscript ID</td>
<td>JAP-03-2016-0004.R2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manuscript Type:</td>
<td>Research Paper</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Keywords:</td>
<td>Safeguarding, Forced marriage, vulnerable adult, Frontline practice, Learning disabilities, Intellectual disabilities</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Safeguarding people with learning disabilities from forced marriage: the role of Safeguarding Adult Boards

Introduction

The subject of forced marriage is receiving an increasingly high profile in both media and policy debate. With discussions frequently set within the context of violence against women, immigration control and cultural ‘otherness’, the practice is also widely acknowledged as an abuse of human rights (Clawson & Fyson, under review; Philips & Dustin 2004; Chantler et al, 2009; Gill & Mitra-Khan 2010; Chantler, 2012; Wind-Cowie et al, 2012). It is well established that the consequences of being forced to marry (or attempts being made to force a marriage) may include rape, pregnancy, physical, sexual and emotional abuse, kidnap, drugging and even death (HM Government, 2014). Forced marriage is therefore clearly a safeguarding issue and falls within the remit of adult safeguarding legislation, policy and practice. Safeguarding Adult Boards have a key role in identifying and preventing forced marriage, including forced marriage of people with learning disabilities.

Previous research has suggested that there is limited awareness amongst statutory and voluntary sector organisations of generic Government guidelines on forced marriage (Gangoli et al, 2006). It is likely that even fewer of these organisations are aware of the specific guidance on forced marriage of people with learning disabilities - first published by the UK Government in 2010, and subsequently updated in 2014 (HM Government 2010b; 2014). Given the central role which, at local level, this guidance gives to Boards the present study set out to explore the extent to which Boards were aware of and fulfilling their responsibilities in this area.

A forced marriage occurs where ‘one or both spouses do not consent to the marriage but are coerced into it’ (UK Government, 2014, p7). Forced marriage is not condoned by any religious group (Groce et al, 2014), it is not a ‘cultural tradition’ and is different to an arranged marriage in which the family of both spouses take a leading role in orchestrating the marriage but the decision to accept the arrangement remains with the prospective spouses. Exact figures for forced marriages in the UK are not known, there is a lack of reliable data which makes determining the actual scale of the issue impossible (Philips & Dustin 2004), forced marriage is largely a hidden crime and cases reported are likely to represent the tip of the iceberg. The UK Government’s Forced Marriage Unit (FMU) – a joint initiative between the Home Office and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office – was established in 2005 to tackle the problem of forced marriage. The FMU collates and publishes annual figures on all cases of forced marriage reported to them. It has seen a steady increase in the reported number of forced marriages, rising from 400 in 2007 (HM Government Select Committee, 2008) to over 1220 cases in 2015 (FMU, 2015). However it has also been estimated that cases could be as high as 8000 per year (Kazimirski et al 2009). The FMU notes ‘Despite the recorded numbers, forced marriage still remains a hidden practice, as many more cases remain unreported’ (HM Government 2014, p2).

It is well established that people with learning disabilities can be forced to marry (ACT, 2012; FMU, 2013-2015) and there are examples of action to protect adults with learning disabilities from forced marriage being heard in the Court of Protection (Sandwell Metropolitan Borough Council v RG, GG, SK and SKG [2013] EWHC 2373 (COP)); XCC v AA & Anor (Rev 3) [2012] EWHC 2183 (COP) (26 July 2012)). These cases most often centre on whether or not the adult with learning disabilities has the capacity to consent to marry (Kroese & Taylor, 2011). The law says that nobody can marry unless they have capacity to consent – the Mental Capacity Act 2005 does not allow best interest decisions to be made about whether an individual should or should not marry. People with learning disabilities who have limited mental capacities may be at greater risk than other people of being forced, coerced or persuaded to marry (HM Government, 2014).

Forced marriage is frequently portrayed as a gendered issue, and an issue which primarily affects women from Asian communities (Gangoli et al, 2006). However, in reality forced marriage can affect men or women of any age and from any national or cultural background. In 2015 the FMU dealt with cases of forced marriage involving people from over 67 countries including Afghanistan, Somalia, Turkey and Sri Lanka and 20% of victims were male (FMU, 2015). FMU statistics indicate that in the UK forced marriage of people with and without learning disabilities is most prevalent within Pakistani, Bangladeshi and Indian communities (FMU, 2015). This reflects the fact that the UK has large settled communities originating from these Asian countries, where marriage and honour are both held in high regard. Globally, forced marriage is not associated with particular countries but rather with particular cultures, especially those where the implicit moral code of conduct is based on collective responsibilities rather than individual rights (Srinivasan & Karlan, 1997). In such cultures, marriage, honour and shame are connected by complex notions surrounding the status and reputation of wider family within the community with children being expected to obey their parents’ wishes. Where a child (including a now-adult child) has a learning disability these cultural norms may interact with cultural (mis)understandings of disability and the belief that marriage can ‘cure’ learning disability (Ann Craft Trust (ACT), 2012; Groce et al, 2014) to heighten the risk of forced marriage. This constellation of factors is believed to explain why the evidence shows that amongst people with learning disabilities, forced marriage is a matter which affects men and women in equal numbers (Clawson & Fyson, under review).

The FMU first produced statutory guidance on forced marriage in 2008, this guidance was aimed at ‘all persons and bodies in England and Wales who exercise public functions to protect adults with support needs from abuse’ (2008, p6). The guidance made clear that responsibility lay with local strategic bodies to lead the way in ensuring policy and practice was adequate for addressing the problem, stating that ‘Multi-Agency Adult Protection Management Committees are likely to take a lead role in developing policies and procedures for inter-agency working and information sharing to protect adults ... from harm’ (p18). However, one weakness of this guidance was that it contained very little information about safeguarding vulnerable adults, including those with a learning disability, from forced marriage. This omission was partly addressed by the subsequent publication of multi-agency practice guidelines for working with people with learning disabilities at risk of forced marriage (HM Government 2010b). These guidelines were clear that local safeguarding policy and practice should address the specific needs of people with learning disabilities; it also recognised that structures and policies in place at the time may not have adequately protected people with learning disabilities:

Existing structures may not always meet the needs of children and adults with learning disabilities; it may be that existing policies and procedures require adaptation to ensure the safeguarding needs to tackle this issue are met. Strategic bodies should ensure that their member agencies work effectively to be sure that existing policies and procedures include ways of meeting the specific needs of children and adults with learning disabilities. (FMU, 2010b, p7)

This project therefore explored the extent to which Safeguarding Adult Boards have addressed the requirements of statutory and practice guidelines and incorporated suggestions into their local policies, procedures and practice with people with learning disabilities at risk of forced marriage. The study was undertaken in 2012-13, by which time Boards might reasonably have been expected to implement the guidance.

Methodology

The study consisted of two elements, which ran concurrently: a national survey of 127
English Safeguarding Adult Boards and two interviews.

The first element was an online survey of English Boards. An email outlining the study, inviting participation and including a link to an online survey was sent to 127 Boards with a request that the survey was completed by the Board Manager or the Board Chair. The survey asked a set of sixteen simple, factual questions about the Boards’ policies and procedures, and also provided space for additional qualitative comments. Fifty-eight Boards responded to the survey, giving a response rate of 46%.

The second element of the study was two interviews, one with the manager of a Safeguarding Adult Board and one with the manager of a Safeguarding Children’s Board, with a view to comparing and contrasting their engagement with the issue of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities. Attempts were made to engage a number of other Safeguarding Board managers (the initial plan was to interview four Safeguarding Adult Board managers and four Safeguarding Children Board managers; the fact that so few were willing to engage may be some indication of the wider lack of engagement with this issue.) The interviews aimed to develop a deeper understanding of Board responses to cases of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities, how cases were recorded; how this information fed into local safeguarding policies; what training was available for frontline professionals, etc. Each interview lasted between 45 and 55 minutes; both were audio recorded and fully transcribed prior to coding and analysis.

Quantitative data from the survey was used to provide descriptive statistics (see tables 1-4, below). Qualitative data from both the surveys and interviews was combined and subject to a thematic analysis of content. Unless otherwise stated, quotes are from survey respondents.

This project was exploratory in nature and does not claim to provide definitive findings.
However, it does provide some insights into the extent to which Boards are – or are not – engaging with the issue of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities. The findings are discussed below in terms of their implications for safeguarding policy and practice.

Findings

Overall, the findings from this study indicate a general lack of engagement on the part of Boards in the subject of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities. However, as will be shown, there were also indications that a small proportion of Boards did recognise this as an adult safeguarding matter they were working to address. The main themes which emerged from the qualitative data can be broadly summarised as (i) the extent to which Boards accepted and understood forced marriage in general, and forced marriage of people with learning disabilities in particular, as falling within their policy and practice remit; (ii) the extent to which Boards were or were not taking a cross-disciplinary local strategic lead on this issue; and (iii) what action Boards were taking to ensure that their workforce had the necessary skills and knowledge to respond appropriately and effectively to individual cases of forced marriage of adults with learning disabilities.

Engagement of local Boards with national policy

National guidelines indicate that local Boards have a clear role to play in strategic decision making on safeguarding policy and practice. Responsibilities relating to safeguarding adults with learning disabilities at risk of forced marriage are outlined in statutory and practice guidance (HM Government 2008, 2010a, 2010b). Responses to the survey made clear that these responsibilities were being embraced by some, but not all, Boards. Although most Boards indicated that they were engaged with the issue of forced marriage in general, far fewer showed evidence of actively addressing the specific needs of people with learning disabilities.

(Insert table one here)

Most Boards (71%) had included forced marriage as a definition of abuse in the safeguarding policies they produced and more (74%) were sure that specific guidance was in place for single agencies on handling cases. The Safeguarding Adult Board agreeing to be interviewed recognised that there was no reference to forced marriage in their safeguarding policy, although the Board website included resources focussed on the issue. However, despite a clear steer from the Forced Marriage and Learning Disabilities: Multi-Agency Practice Guidelines (HM Government, 2010b) on the need to be sure that policies meet the specific needs of people with learning disabilities, only a third (33%) had addressed this in their safeguarding policies. This is disappointing given that almost double (62%) stated they were aware of the practice guidelines.

The Statutory guidelines (HM Government 2008, 2010a) make clear that multi-agency strategies need to be in place for dealing with forced marriage. The survey responses demonstrated that only one third of Boards were sure they had a multi-agency strategy in place. The Safeguarding Adult Board agreeing to be interviewed acknowledged that although guidance on forced marriage is available for individual groups of staff such as social workers, police and health workers within their own agencies, the Board has a role to play in ensuring a multi-agency strategy works

> Obviously as a Board our role is to ensure that agencies are doing correct things around multi-agency well. But within their own organisations as ...pointed out they will have their own policies (Adult Board Interviewee)

The survey results also demonstrated that few Boards (20%) identified involvement in regional networks looking at issues of forced marriage and fewer (9%) were involved in regional networks that considered the specific needs of people with learning disabilities thus reducing opportunities to develop shared policies and protocols and to share information and skills in working in this area. This finding however fits with comments made by some Boards that forced marriage is not a priority given competing demands for scarce resources, one noted ‘This is has not been a priority area but is acknowledged as a risk issue’.

Monitoring and strategic planning

Safeguarding Adults Boards are intended to provide a forum for strategic discussion and planning on a range of issues including prevention of abuse. In order for improvements to be made to planning and responding to forced marriage Boards need to have knowledge about the numbers and types of cases within their geographical areas. The statutory guidelines (HM Government, 2010a) make clear that cases of forced marriage needed to be monitored and recorded.
Only 22% of Boards were aware of any cases of actual or threatened forced marriage of people with learning disabilities in their area and although it is clear that individual agencies may be recording cases, there is no consistent mechanism for numbers to be collated by Boards to aid strategic planning for resources and training. Five Boards were aware of one case and two were aware of two cases of forced marriage of a person with a learning disability in the previous year. Others were aware that data existed but did not know the numbers.

The Board keeps a database of all FM cases for adults.

I would have to check the latest performance data...

Interestingly, although neither Board interviewed were aware of cases being referred to them, their expectation was that they should be

I would expect that information to come to the attention of our Safeguarding Strategic Team then I take that information to the Board. One hasn’t come through to our attention (Adult Board interviewee)

I’d expect us to hear, yes...I’d expect a serious case review...Or a referral to our serious cases panel (Children’s Board interviewee)

However, both interviewees recognised that cases were not routinely being recorded as forced marriage and could potentially be recorded under a different category of abuse creating further difficulties with ascertaining actual numbers of cases. This was understood as linked to the problem of practitioners not recognising forced marriage

Possibly in the future they’d refer it [forced marriage] in as well. People aren’t always aware of what they see (Children’s Board interviewee)

My understanding is that we don’t routinely record information saying we’ve had a safeguarding referral relating to forced marriage...it could show up say, as emotional abuse... One of the issues is people’s knowledge of forced marriage. So we could be dealing with something that has the elements of that in it but it has gone through the system as nobody has put that title to it (Adult Board interviewee)

One survey response recognised that a lack of robust reporting and recording system impacted upon their ability to respond strategically

_This is difficult as due to under-reporting and also recording issues it is hard to get an appreciation of the extent of the problem. Until we are aware of this it is difficult to gauge where this issue should be in the list of Board priorities_

If the specific needs of people with learning disabilities are to be included in strategy and policy development and implementation it seems reasonable to have a named specialist overseeing this process, indeed the statutory guidelines (HM Government, 2010a) make clear that agencies should have a lead specialist with responsibility for all forced marriages in their area. Only 14% of Boards were aware of this being the case in the agencies represented on the Board and of those only one specifically outlined someone with a responsibility for people with learning disabilities, whilst others gave more generic safeguarding responses, including ‘Police lead’; ‘The business manager for the Board’; or:

_The Learning Disabilities Contract and Commissioning manager is the link – we also have links with the voluntary sector agencies who have expertise in forced marriage issues rather than LD specific issues._

Just over half of Boards (55%) were aware of forced marriage being discussed at Board meetings. Neither of the Boards interviewed were aware of discussions taking place. Survey results showed discussions mostly centred around reviewing, developing and implementing policy, procedures and training as the following quotes demonstrate

_In relation to development of policies and procedures_

_Discussions regarding implementation of guidance locally_

Some discussions reflected the fact that it was not always clear where forced marriage should ‘sit’ within the safeguarding agenda or where information on forced marriage would go
To decide if it sat in the vulnerable adults agenda or the domestic violence agenda.

Guidance goes to community safety partnerships and I wonder if some of this work sits there and doesn't come to the safeguarding Boards. I think there maybe something in there that is clouding the issues (Children’s Board interviewee).

Perhaps unsurprisingly, a smaller number of Boards (31%) had discussed forced marriage of people with learning disabilities at Board meetings. Here discussions centred on individual cases as well as policy development or implementation indicating that perhaps where people with learning disabilities are concerned Boards might work in a reactive rather than proactive way:

We had a case where we worked with ... for a woman with LD who was coerced into marriage. We have also worked on another case where we asked ... to put a caveat on a LD woman being married.

One Board did make reference to the need to develop a forced marriage policy that included people with learning disabilities and another very usefully drew upon the need for Children and Adult Boards to work together, particularly at the time of transition, although this point was not specifically linked to forced marriage:

And also the issue of the interface between children’s and adult services. It is easy for people with learning disabilities to disappear when they reach 18, with different eligibility in adult social care and the difficulty of getting different databases to share information between services.

This theme was returned to by a number of Boards recognising the benefits of a more joined up approach and looking to develop policies on forced marriage across the Children’s and Adults sectors:

There is a HBA [Honour based abuse] sub group to the safeguarding adults and children’s Boards which looks at HBA, FM [forced marriage] and FGM [female genital mutilation] and includes issues of LD...we have just developed an action plan and a directory of service for staff on national organisations.
Have agreed to approach...[Children’s Board] to develop a joint process to consider possible situations of forced marriage across children and adults.

Children and Adult Safeguarding Boards hosted a ...Domestic Violence Forum, Karma Nirvana and Forced Marriage Unit were guest speakers. A joint policy is being developed, updates given to both Boards.

The need for a more joined up approach was also evident in Board responses relating to how well equipped frontline practitioners are to deal with forced marriage.

Knowledge and skills of frontline practitioners

Safeguarding Adult Boards have a role to play in ensuring that practice is continuously improving and that frontline practitioners are equipped with the skills and knowledge required to tackle abuse.

Insert table 3 here

The majority of Boards recognise that forced marriage is an issue that must be addressed. Over half (58%) stated that they considered forced marriage of people with learning disabilities to be an area of concern that the Board should address, worryingly however 42% said they did not think it was, did not know or provided no answer. Some Boards linked the issue to the more generic concept that any vulnerable person at risk would be a cause for concern rather that seeing forced marriage as a specific issue. Others recognised that although not high on the agenda it was something they planned for, whilst others still said it was not as a priority as it competes alongside other higher priorities

We would attach equal importance to this issue as we would to all groups of vulnerable people.

We do not really have high numbers of concerns about forced marriage, however we do believe that it is a very important subject and that practitioners should be aware of guidance and how to respond.
I don’t think it’s been high on the agenda for our safeguarding Board that I am aware of as unfortunately it is one area of safeguarding which completes alongside others.

As noted earlier, many Boards did include forced marriage as a definition of abuse and had policies in place that reflected what was required of practitioners in dealing with such cases. However, although the majority were aware of the practice guidelines for working with people with learning disabilities (HM Government, 2010b) only 34% were sure that staff had access to them, thus almost two thirds were unaware if practitioners had access to this valuable resource. Additionally, the research found that some Boards were not equipping practitioners with the skills and knowledge required to adequately protect people with learning disabilities at risk from forced marriage. The statutory guidelines (HM Government, 2010a) make clear that training and awareness raising on forced marriage should be incorporated into existing training and staff should receive regular updates so they have the knowledge and skills required to respond. A lack of clarity emerged in the interviews around Board and individual agency responsibility for ensuring staff had access to policies and resources to improve knowledge and skills

Individual agencies [have responsibility] with regards to safeguarding per se in relation to procedures but by being part of the Board ensuring that policies are in place and being adhered to. I expect that I as Chair can be re-assured that things are in place as far as possible. I realise that it’s not a perfect world but where we are learning more and more I’d expect agencies to do something about it….I believe the role of the Board is to drive the agenda forward across the whole spectrum. (Adult Board interviewee)

Safeguarding Adult Boards provide a forum for strategic discussion on training and guidance to be provided to practitioners. Just over a third (41%) of Boards stated they provided training which specifically offered practitioners the opportunity to develop their knowledge on forced marriage per se. However, reviewing the comments revealed that some Boards had provided ‘one off events’ and in others forced marriage was included within other training rather than being a stand-alone topic. A number of Boards commented that the topic of forced marriage was covered within other courses.

This is incorporated into lots of other training packages so the message is regularly reinforced.
And one survey respondent again saw the benefit of the Children and Adult Board working closely together

_The initial three courses were provided jointly by Children and Adults Safeguarding Board_

However, when it came to training on the issue of people with learning disabilities being forced to marry only 7% of Boards were sure that this was covered by their training packages. Two Boards were clear that courses looking at the issues for people with learning disabilities were available in their area. However, the comments reflected that for others the issues relating to people with learning disabilities were being addressed within broader safeguarding courses leading perhaps to the danger that the very specific issues relating to how forced marriages of people with learning disabilities differ to other forced marriages being missed.

_We have asked our LD network to discuss this with LD service users and providers._

_Half day awareness raising session – what it is, reasons for why it happens, how to respond (geared around young people but includes people with learning disabilities)._

It is the role of each Board to assure itself that adequate safeguarding arrangements are in place. It is therefore perhaps a little concerning to note that only 3% of Boards were ‘very confident’ and a further 33% ‘fairly confident’ that the agencies represented on the Boards contained practitioners whom they considered to have the knowledge and skills required to adequately address the issue of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities.

Insert table 4 here

This worryingly means that 43% were ‘not very’ confident and 7% ‘not confident’ at all (14% did not answer). As might be expected, it was clear that Boards held differing views regarding staff groups with specific perceived expertise, for example some said they might have confidence in practitioners working directly with people with learning disabilities but not others or one type of practitioner group over another.
It is not an area we have a lot of expertise in given that we have only 1 case. Therefore practitioners in Adults (excluding LD) may not be as fully informed of the issues as those working within the LD service.

It would depend on the specific profession e.g. would have more confidence in the Police.

Some Boards recognised that a lack of available training impacted upon ability of practitioners to respond appropriately

Those who have attended the training should have the skills however there are lots of practitioners who don’t attend training.

Training limited; [we] need to try and reach key information to children and vulnerable adults’ workforce.

But only three Boards explicitly recognised the specific difficulties arising from staff being (un)able to distinguish between forced marriage and arranged or consensual marriage in order to deal with it appropriately. This links with the finding outlined earlier that lack of recognition impacted upon appropriate recording

I believe there is a real lack of awareness of the issue and confusion as to the difference between arranged and forced marriage. Also linking with issues of capacity...

My concern is that, although there is guidance available for staff, it is dependent upon staff recognising that forced marriage is an issue in a particular case. It also concerns me that there is no formal process to link children’s and adults’ services response to potential forced marriage situations.

If we are aware of an incident of forced marriage we would utilise the multi-agency procedures to address this. I am however not confident that it would be recognised as such in the first place.

This is an area that Boards clearly need to address if forced marriage is to be recognised and responded to.
Discussion

This research found inconsistencies in approaches to forced marriage, echoing Wind-Cowie et al’s findings (2012) that there is a lack of understanding of forced marriage among frontline workers and commissioners and, additionally, although adequate guidelines and materials are available, these are often not incorporated into local government and NHS policies and strategic plans. The research findings demonstrate that although some Boards are engaged with the issue of forced marriage, many do not recognise the very specific needs of people with learning disabilities within their policy, planning or training. For some it is not a priority; more worryingly however, others do not see it as an issue they need to address at all. This gives cause for concern: previous research (Clawson & Fyson, under review; ACT 2012; Gangoli et al, 2006) and the present study demonstrate the difficulties many practitioners have in identifying cases of forced marriage, understanding the differences between arranged marriage and forced marriage and managing issues of consent (Kroese & Taylor, 2011).

The difficulties practitioners face in dealing with the problem is not unique to forced marriage however: Gilligan & Akhtar (2006) point to Cheetham’s broader (1982) assertion that ‘social workers are doubtful about their ability to judge needs and problems in unfamiliar cultures’ (2006, p1362); despite the passage of time, it would seem that many social workers struggle with being ‘culturally competent’ (Jani et al, 2016). Boards are aware of practitioners’ lack of knowledge and skills but need to take a more robust approach in addressing this deficit. The lack of access to specific guidelines and relevant training is a cause for concern as for as Webb et al postulate “The attitudes, knowledge base and behaviours of professionals are affected by the quality of training provided” (2002, p407). Many marriages will go unnoticed without a workforce trained to understand the specific issues related to forced marriage of people with learning disabilities. It is therefore crucial that Boards play a leading role in ensuring all practitioners working with people with learning disabilities have the knowledge and skills to adequately recognise and address this issue.

Conclusion

In 2012 when this research project was undertaken statutory and practice guidance (HM Government, 2009, 2010a; 2010b) set out the duties and responsibilities of those tasked with safeguarding adults from forced marriage including Safeguarding Adult Boards. The guidance stipulated that bodies with a safeguarding function should have policies and procedures in place to ensure people are protected from forced marriage and that a named person for ensuring cases are handled, monitored and recorded should be in place. The guidance foresaw Boards as having a leading role in the development of policies and practice for multi-agency working and information sharing. Since completing the research new legislation has been enacted which strengthens safeguarding policy and practice. The Care Act 2014 places Boards on a statutory footing and has introduced new safeguarding duties for local authorities. In addition, the act of forcing a person to marry was made a criminal offence in 2014 under s.121 of the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act. Boards should now be in a stronger position to tackle the problem of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities, this however will only be possible with a changed narrative on forced marriage which recognises learning disability as a vulnerability factor.

This paper demonstrates that forced marriage of people with learning disabilities raises many complex issues for Boards and the wider safeguarding community in terms of recognition of cases and planning for intervention. The updated statutory guidelines on forced marriage (HM Government 2014) places clear responsibilities on Chief Executives, directors and senior managers in ensuring that the workforce is adequately trained and that policies exist to tackle forced marriage. However, anecdotal evidence from practitioners and policy makers suggests that little has changed since this research was completed. Forced marriage policy and practice aimed primarily at protecting the general population is inadequate in meeting the specific needs of people with learning disabilities. Moreover, without clearer information on how many people are affected, Boards cannot strategically plan or estimate training and service requirements to protect people with learning disabilities.

More Boards need to develop structures which support practitioners to build a sound knowledge and skill base that recognises and responds to forced marriage of people with learning disabilities. In times of austerity it may not be financially or practically viable for Boards to provide specific training focussing on forced marriage of people with learning disabilities. Nevertheless, all Boards should provide training on forced marriage as a core element of their adult safeguarding training and all training on forced marriage should incorporate teaching on the specific features of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities. People with learning disabilities have a right to live their lives free from abuse. Forced marriage should be on the agenda of all Safeguarding Adult Boards in order to ensure the risks are properly recognised and addressed in both policy and practice.

Acknowledgements

This project was generously funded by the Home Office/Foreign and Commonwealth Office Forced Marriage Unit Domestic Programme Fund.

Ethical approval was obtained from the University of Nottingham School of Sociology and Social Policy Ethics Committee.

Permission was granted by the Association of Directors of Adult Social Services Research Group.

Thank you to Dr. Rachel Fyson for her extremely helpful comments on an earlier draft of this paper.

References

Clawson, R & Fyson, R. (under review) ’Forced marriage of people with learning disabilities: a human rights issue’ submitted to Disability & Society

HM Government (2010b) Forced Marriage and Learning Disabilities: Multi-agency practice guidelines Forced Marriage Unit

HM Government Select Committee on Home Affairs Appendix 79 (2008) http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm200708/cmselect/cmhaff/263/263we106.htm accessed on 05.07.16

Safeguarding people with learning disabilities from forced marriage: the role of Safeguarding Adult Boards

Table one: application of policy

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Question</th>
<th>Yes</th>
<th>No</th>
<th>Don’t know</th>
<th>Did not answer</th>
<th>Total</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Is forced marriage included within the definition of abuse used in your safeguarding policies and procedures?</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>100%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>71%</td>
<td>15%</td>
<td>2%</td>
<td>12%</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Does your safeguarding policy include specific guidance on forced marriage?</td>
<td>43</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>100%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>74%</td>
<td>12%</td>
<td>4%</td>
<td>10%</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Does your safeguarding policy include specific guidance on forced marriage of people with learning disabilities?</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>26</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>100%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>33%</td>
<td>45%</td>
<td>10%</td>
<td>12%</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do you have in place a multi-agency strategy for forced marriage?</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>30</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>100%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>33%</td>
<td>52%</td>
<td>3%</td>
<td>12%</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Are you aware of the Forced Marriage and Learning Disabilities:</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>100%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Multi-Agency Practice Guidelines (2010b)?</td>
<td>62%</td>
<td>23%</td>
<td>3%</td>
<td>12%</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do agencies represented on the Safeguarding Board contribute to regional networks on forced marriage?</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>24</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>100%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>20%</td>
<td>26%</td>
<td>41%</td>
<td>13%</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do agencies represented on the Safeguarding Board contribute to regional networks on forced marriage of people with learning disabilities?</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>100%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>9%</td>
<td>29%</td>
<td>50%</td>
<td>12%</td>
<td></td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>
Table 2: Monitoring and Strategic planning

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Question</th>
<th>Answer</th>
<th>Total</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Yes</td>
<td>No</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Have you had discussions concerning forced marriage of people with learning disabilities at your Board meetings?</td>
<td>18 (31%)</td>
<td>30 (52%)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Have you had discussions concerning forced marriage at your Board meetings?</td>
<td>32 (55%)</td>
<td>18 (31%)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Are you aware of any cases of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities in your area?</td>
<td>13 (22%)</td>
<td>33 (57%)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do you have a named specialist for people with learning disabilities at risk of forced marriage?</td>
<td>8 (14%)</td>
<td>34 (59%)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Safeguarding people with learning disabilities from forced marriage: the role of Safeguarding Adult Boards

Table 3: Knowledge and Skills of frontline practitioners

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Question</th>
<th>Answer</th>
<th>Total</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Do all frontline practitioners have access to a copy of the Forced Marriage and Learning Disabilities: Multi-Agency Practice Guidelines (2010b)?</td>
<td>Yes: 20 (34%)</td>
<td>No: 15 (26%)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Do you consider forced marriage of people with learning disabilities to be an area of concern for your Board?</td>
<td>Yes: 34 (58%)</td>
<td>No: 8 (14%)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Does your area offer a specific training course on forced marriage?</td>
<td>Yes: 24 (41%)</td>
<td>No: 19 (33%)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Does your area offer a specific training course on forced marriage of people with learning disabilities?</td>
<td>Yes: 4 (7%)</td>
<td>No: 34 (58%)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Safeguarding people with learning disabilities from forced marriage: the role of Safeguarding Adult Boards

Table 4 Confidence in frontline practitioners

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>How confident are you that frontline practitioners have the knowledge and skills to adequately address the issue of forced marriage of people with learning disabilities?</th>
<th>Very Confident</th>
<th>Fairly Confident</th>
<th>Not Very Confident</th>
<th>Not Confident</th>
<th>No answer</th>
<th>Total</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>100%</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3%</td>
<td>33%</td>
<td>43%</td>
<td>7%</td>
<td>14%</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>